It is true that, in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (1), the point which has now to be determined did not directly arise, inasmuch as in that case the charterparty contained the stipulation that the cargo was to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port, and I cannot agree with what appears to have been the view of LORD BLACKBURN, that this was necessarily the same as the implied obligation to discharge within a reasonable time. In that case it was proved that the mode of discharge customary in the port was by means of a warp and lighters, and that these were under the absolute control of a company to which the government authorities had transferred all their powers, and that the company allowed vessels the use of the warp and lighters in turn. The result was that, owing to the presence of a considerable number of ships, the turn of the appellant's vessel did not come for a considerable time. It appears to me that, under those circumstances, the judgment was inevitable that the cargo had been discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port, and also that Postlethwaite v. Freeland (1) cannot be taken as a decision concluding the question arising on this appeal. The dicta are undoubtedly of great weight, and I concur with the result at which LORD BLACKBURN arrived, that so far as there was prior authority it pointed in the direction of the view adopted in the present case by the Court of Appeal. B C D

LORD BLACKBURN excepted Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. (4), regarding the decision there as conflicting with that of the Court of Appeal in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (1). It is to be observed that THESIGER, L.J., who had been a party to the judgment in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. (4), was also a party to the decision in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (1) in the Court of Appeal. He manifestly did not intend to lay down the law differently in the two cases, nor do I think there is any necessary conflict between them, although, no doubt, expressions are to be found in the judgments in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. (4) which favour the contention of the appellant in the present case. COTTON, L.J., in his judgment in that case, in terms says that he will not attempt to lay down an exhaustive rule, but will speak chiefly with reference to the case then before the court. The facts there were that the cargo was to be delivered into lighters alongside, or at the wharf, as charterers' agents might direct, no time being fixed within which the discharge was to take place. At the port of discharge there were only two firms of lightermen for discharging cargoes, one of which worked solely for the defendants, the charterers, and the captain was compelled to employ that firm alone to discharge the vessel. At the time when the vessel arrived the port was unusually crowded by a "rush" of vessels, and about twenty vessels were lying there, of which one half either belonged to or were chartered by the defendants. The number of lighters was small, and it was proved that after the arrival of the vessel preference in discharging cargoes was shown to vessels with "round" charters. E F G H

The learned judge who tried the case, in summing-up, told the jury that they were to take into consideration the circumstance that the port was full of vessels, but he did not directly tell them not to consider the deficiency of lighters caused by the large number of ships, so far as that state of things had been produced by the defendants themselves; nor did he tell them that the defendants were bound to provide the means of unloading within a reasonable time; nor that they were bound to allot the lighters proportionately among the vessels, or to use the lighters for them in the order in which they arrived. The jury found in favour of the defendants, and the appeal was against the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division making absolute a rule for a new trial. It will thus be seen that the circumstances which prevented the vessel being discharged within the ordinary time were not beyond the control of the defendants. It was not shown that they could not by reasonable precautions or exertions have procured the necessary lighters elsewhere or earlier and so have avoided the delay which took I

A place. Under these circumstances I think the decision was perfectly right, and a new trial properly granted.

In my opinion the cases referred to by the appellant's counsel in which it has been held that there was a breach of the obligation on the part of a charterer to supply a cargo do not involve the assertion of any doctrine in conflict with that which has been laid down in the present case by the Court of Appeal.

B For these reasons, my Lords, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was correct, and ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—Although the question raised in this appeal is submitted for the first time to the determination of an English court, the principles which must govern its decision are as old as the law of contract. When the language of a contract does not expressly, or by necessary implication, fix any time for the performance of a contractual obligation, the law implies that it shall be performed within a reasonable time. The rule is of universal application, and is not confined to contracts for the carriage of goods by sea. In the case of other contracts the condition of reasonable time has been frequently interpreted, and has invariably been held to mean that the party upon whom it is incumbent duly fulfils his obligation, notwithstanding protracted delay, so long as such delay is attributable to causes beyond his control, and he has neither acted negligently nor unreasonably. In the face of the admission given by him at the trial, it is in vain for the appellant to suggest that the delay which occurred in unloading the Derwentdale's cargo, was owing to causes under the respondents' control, or to their failure to do anything which could possibly or reasonably have been done in order to avoid that delay.

In that state of the law and of the facts, it is, in my opinion, impossible that the appellant can prevail, unless he is able to show that the rule as administered in the case of other contracts is subject, when the contract is constituted by bill of lading, to the singular exception that the owner of the goods must be held to have acted unreasonably, and to be liable for the delay, whenever the operation of unloading is stopped by an unforeseen obstacle which he did nothing to create and is powerless to remove. A proposition of that character requires some authority to support it, but none has been produced. In none of the cases cited at the Bar does it appear to me that the point now raised was present to the minds of the learned judges. But it is sufficient for the purposes of this appeal, that, while nothing was said in any of them which lends the least countenance to the proposition maintained by the appellant, much was said pointing in an opposite direction. These cases, in so far as they were founded on by the appellant as authorities in his favour, have been carefully examined in the opinion just delivered by my noble and learned friend, to whose reasons for affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal I have nothing to add.

H LORD ASHBOURNE.—The question raised in this appeal is important, and is up to this not covered by any express authority. Having regard to the admissions of the parties, the sole question is: Who is to bear the loss caused by the strike? Who is to bear the risk of the strike, assuming each party to be innocent, that each party did what he could, and that the happening of the strike was entirely beyond and outside the control of either?

I The contract not naming any time for unloading, the obligation of the defendants was to unload within the time implied by law, that is, a reasonable time. What is the meaning of this expression, "reasonable time"? It is obvious that "reasonable" cannot mean a definite and fixed time. It would not be "reasonable" if it was not sufficiently elastic to allow the consideration of circumstances which all reason would require to be taken into account. The appellant, accordingly, admits that the consignee has a right to have all ordinary circumstances taken into account, but insists that all extraordinary circumstances are to be excluded from consideration. Is this distinction sound, and does it rest upon any real principle? If the consignee does all he can, is not his conduct reasonable? If by circumstances absolutely outside his control he can do nothing, is his inaction unreasonable? If it is reasonable to consider some circumstances outside his control in favour of the consignee, why are not all circumstances in the events which actually happen, and he cannot control, also to be taken into account? In considering how to ascertain "reasonable time," must not the question come in whether the consignee, in the circumstances which eventuated, acted unreasonably? If throughout the consignee acted reasonably, if he did all he could, if he omitted nothing that he should have done, why should all the circumstances be arbitrarily divided into ordinary and extraordinary for the purpose of putting a narrow and artificial meaning upon the words "reasonable time?" Unless lex cogit ad impossibilia, I think, when the parties have used a form of contract which names no day, and leaves the discharge of the cargo to be made within the reasonable time implied by law, that reasonable time should be ascertained by a consideration of all circumstances which eventually happen, and are outside the control of the consignee.

It is somewhat strange that this important question has not heretofore been clearly and finally settled by direct authority, and it is manifest, from the arguments addressed to your Lordships, that the decisions in somewhat similar cases are conflicting, and the opinions of eminent judges would appear not to harmonise. The particular point involved in this appeal has never, I believe, been expressly discussed or decided, although the decisions which have been referred to deal with topics and considerations most apposite to the case before your Lordships. Ford v. Cotesworth (2) is worthy of attention. The contract was silent as to time, and, therefore, the freighter was bound to unload within a reasonable time. Owing to threats of bombardment the cargo could not be landed in the usual time, and it was held that the charterer was not liable for the delivery. COCKBURN, C.J., in his summing-up, said:

"There would be a point of law whether this case was to be decided with reference to the ordinary state of things at the port, or whether any extraordinary circumstances that prevented the unloading might be taken into account."

The questions left to the jury were whether, looking to the ordinary state of things at the port, there was any unreasonable delay; whether, looking to the extraordinary circumstances, there was any unreasonable delay; whether there was any delay caused by political circumstances over which the consignees had no control; whether there was any delay caused by the default of the consignees; and the jury were asked contingently to assess the damages for the time during which the ship was kept at her berth doing nothing by the action of the government of the place and the threats of bombardment. The jury, in answer to the first two questions, found that there had been no unreasonable delay, and they assessed the damages if any were to be allowed.

The plaintiff applied to the Queen's Bench to enter the verdict for him; and that court held that the contract implied by law was that each party would use reasonable diligence in performing their part of the delivery, which, by the custom of the port, fell upon him, and that there was no implied contract that the discharge should be performed in the time usually taken at the port. BLACKBURN, J., in pronouncing the judgment of the court, said (L.R. 4 Q.B. at pp. 136, 137:

"We are aware of no authority for saying that the law implies a contract to discharge in the usual time, except what is said in Burmester v. Hodgson (5), in which case it was not necessary for the decision. We think that the contract which the law implies is only that the merchant and shipowner should each use reasonable despatch in performing his part. That such was the opinion of LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., appears to be implied from his ruling

A in Rogers v. Hunter (6) as to what was the obligation of the holder of a bill of lading. If this be so, the delay having happened without fault on either side, and neither having undertaken by contract, express or implied, that there should be no delay, the loss must remain where it falls."

B The Exchequer Chamber also, on appeal, upheld the verdict for the defendant. MARTIN, B., in giving judgment, said (L.R. 5 Q.B. at p. 548):

"I am not aware of any case which goes to impose by mere implication of law, without any stipulation whatever, so unreasonable a liability as that which the plaintiffs seek to impose on the defendants, that they are to be answerable for the delay caused by vis major."

C Ten years later, in 1878, came Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. (4) which has been so much relied on by the appellant. There the charterparty was silent as to time, and, therefore, it was implied that the ship should be unloaded within a reasonable time. BRAMWELL, L.J., said that "a reasonable time for doing an act is a time within which it may be done by a person working reasonably," and THESIGER, L.J., said "a reasonable time means a reasonable time under ordinary circumstances." This decision is naturally relied on by the appellant, although it was not intended in that case to lay down any general rule, and the circumstances were not at all outside the control of the defendants. Postlethwaite v. Freeland (1) is most important in consequence of many of the dicta, although the precise point involved in this case did not actually arise. The EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., in his opinion in the House of Lords, said:

E "If, on the other hand, there is no fixed time, the law implies an agreement on his part to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time; that is, as was said by BLACKBURN, J., in Ford v. Cotesworth (2), 'a reasonable time under all the circumstances'."

F LORD BLACKBURN'S own judgment in this case is the strongest decision in favour of the contention relied on by the respondents, and presents the topics against the appellant's contention with great force.

G These cases and others cited during the argument show that there is a conflict of judicial opinion on the question involved; but, in my opinion, the preponderance of authority and reasoning is against the appellant. Besides, the authorities by way of analogy (as forcibly pointed out by FRY, L.J.) are also against the appellant, and in favour of the view that reasonable time must be determined by reference to the actual events which occur. In Taylor v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (3) it was held that a common carrier was only bound to carry within a reasonable time, looking at all the circumstances of the case. ERLE, C.J., says plainly: "I take reasonable time to mean a time within which a carrier can deliver, using all reasonable exertions." Hall v. Wright (7) also shows an effort to apply a liberal construction of "reasonable time" in an action of breach of promise of marriage, and the American case of Cross v. Beard (8), decided thirty years ago, shows that a breach in a canal and a storm on a lake were taken into account in measuring what was reasonable time.

H But it is not upon analogies or upon conflicting authorities alone that the decision of your Lordships can rest, although they are most valuable and important to elucidate the position. Principle and reason, in my opinion, alike oppose the contention of the appellant. It is somewhat hard to make either party suffer, but there is no help for it. It must be remembered that there are forms of bills of lading which expressly name strikes and such contingencies, and cast the responsibility upon the consignees. If the shipowner wishes the merchant to be answerable for such events he can stipulate for it expressly. It is, no doubt, hard on the shipowner in this case, but I do not apprehend any disturbance in mercantile contracts, as parties can readily, if they please, change the terms of future contracts, and prevent the possibility of misunderstanding or surprise. A

On the grounds that I have referred to, I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed. LORD MORRIS has requested me to say that he concurs in the conclusion at which your Lordships have unanimously arrived.

LORD FIELD.—I concur.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (North, J.), June 30, 1892]

Insurance—Life assurance—Policy—Provisions for application of proceeds—Proceeds not included in bequest of residue.

A policy of life assurance was effected by the testator with a society whose rules provided that on the death of the assured the policy moneys should be paid to the person nominated by the assured to receive them, and, if there were no such nominee, to his assigns under any disposition or charge made by him by deed or will expressly referring to the sum assured or to sums due on assurance generally. If there were no such disposition, the policy moneys were to be paid to the widow of the assured, if any, and, if none, to the children of the assured living at his death in equal shares. The testator never made any nomination, disposition or charge affecting the policy, but by his will he bequeathed his residuary estate on trust for sale and conversion, and to hold the proceeds on trust for his three daughters and the widow and children of a deceased son in equal shares. The three daughters of the testator survived him.

Held: the provisions contained in the policy were valid, and the proceeds did not pass as part of the testator's residuary estate, but belonged to his three daughters.

Special Case stated under R.S.C., Ord. 34.

On Mar. 9, 1847, the Rev. Edward Davies, the testator, effected a policy on his life with the Clergy Mutual Assurance Society for £500. The rules of the society as to assurances in class D, to which the assurance in question belonged, provided that any member of the society should have power to nominate any person or

A persons his, her, or their executors, administrators, or assigns, to receive any sum which should have been assured by such member, and for the registration with the society of such nominations, and for the priority in certain cases of the assigns over the nominees of the assured, and contained the following provision :

B “And in case there shall not be any nomination duly registered existing in respect of the sum assured when due, or so far as no such nomination shall extend, such sum shall be paid to the assigns, if any, of the assurer, so far as the claim of such assigns shall extend, in every case where such claims shall have arisen under any disposition or charge made by the assurer specifically affecting such sum or any part thereof, either by express reference thereto, or by reference generally to sums due upon assurances, whether such disposition or charge shall have been made by deed, will, or codicil, or by any other instrument in writing. And in case there shall not be any nomination duly registered, nor any such disposition or charge as aforesaid, existing in respect of the sum assured when due, or, so far as no such nomination and no such disposition or charge shall extend, such sum shall be paid to the widow of the assured if the assurer be male, or if the assurer be female or being a male shall not leave a widow, then to the child or children of the assurer living at his or her death, if more than one in equal shares . . . , and if there shall be no such child, . . . if the assurer shall be a male . . . to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the assurer.”

E The testator never made any nomination, disposition or charge affecting the policy except so far as the disposition of the residue of his estate by his will operated as such a disposition. By his will, dated Oct. 4, 1889, the testator, after exercising certain powers of appointment contained in his marriage settlement, gave all the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees on trust to sell and convert and pay one equal fourth part of the proceeds to each of his three daughters named in his will, and to retain the remaining fourth part of such proceeds on trust for the widow of a son who had died in his lifetime during her life, and after her death for her children. The will contained no reference to the policy in the F Clergy Mutual Assurance Society, or to sums assured generally. The testator survived his wife, and died on July 25, 1890, having kept up the policy till his death, and leaving him surviving the three daughters named in his will, and the widow and infant children also named therein of the son who died in the testator's lifetime.

G The plaintiffs in the Special Case were the testator's three daughters and the defendants were the widow of his deceased son and her three infant children. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the moneys received under the policy of assurance constituted part of the residuary estate of the testator, or whether the plaintiffs were solely entitled thereto.

H Eve for the plaintiffs.
Bardswell for the defendants.

I NORTH, J.—In my opinion, there can be no doubt about this case. I think that it is covered by authority, if authority were needed. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts, including the provisions of the policy and the rules, and continued:] The testator did not make any nominations in his lifetime. If he had not left any child surviving him, the proceeds of the policy would, in my opinion, have been his property. He could have disposed of them as he pleased, and they would have passed under his will. But he had made a contract, which, I think, was perfectly legal, that the proceeds should go to his surviving children if he did not divert the same from them in a mode which he might have adopted, but which he did not adopt. It is said that this contract is illegal and void on the ground of public policy, because the effect of it is to withdraw the fund from paying his debts. I do not see that it does so. He might have sold the policy in his lifetime. He might have bequeathed it by his will to his executors; or, by the use of apt words in his will, he might have rendered the proceeds of the policy available for the payment of his debts. There is, therefore, nothing in the contract contrary to public policy. And, moreover, if there had been anything illegal as regards creditors, it must be remembered that the present claim is set up, not by creditors of the testator, but by persons who derive their title under his will. As against persons who claim under the will the contract must be effectual. A

In my opinion, Phillips v. Cayley (1) is a distinct authority that such a limitation of the testator's power of appointing by will is perfectly legal. It is valid as regards persons claiming under the will. But I think that it would also be valid as against the creditors of the assured on the principle on which Re Flavell, Murray v. Flavell (2) was decided. Ashby v. Costin (3) is completely adverse to the contention of the defendants. I can see no difference between the death of an assured intestate as to the policy of insurance and his death leaving a will by which he does not exercise the only power which he has of disposing of the proceeds of the policy. Here the testator did not insert in his will words which he might have inserted, and which would have operated to pass the proceeds of the policy. I do not entirely assent to the language used by CAVE, J., in Ashby v. Costin (3) that the money was not the property of the assured; he had a contingent interest which would have become absolute on the happening of a certain event, which, however, did not happen. B C D

In the events which did happen, the testator's three daughters are entitled to the policy money by virtue of special contract between him and the assurance company. He might have defeated their claim in a particular way, but he has not done so.

Sunday, and to which persons shall be admitted by the payment of money . . . shall be deemed a disorderly house or place; and the keeper of such house, room or place shall forfeit the sum of £200 for every day that such house, room or place shall be opened or used as aforesaid on the Lord's Day . . . and the person managing or conducting such entertainment or amusement on the Lord's Day, or acting as master of the ceremonies there, or as . . . chairman of any such meeting for public debate . . . shall likewise for every such offence forfeit the sum of £100 . . .” By s. 2, any person who shall appear, act or behave himself as master, or as the person having the care, government or management of any such house, etc., H I

A shall be deemed to be the keeper thereof, and be liable to be sued or prosecuted, notwithstanding that he be not in fact the real owner or keeper thereof.

B A hall, which belonged to a company in liquidation, was let by the solicitor of the liquidator, as his agent, to a society for the purpose of giving Sunday lectures to which the public was admitted on payment of small sums. A licence for music and dancing on weekdays in respect of the hall had been obtained by the solicitor in his own name. At the trial of an action under the Act of 1780 against the solicitor and two other persons who had each acted as chairman at one of the lectures, introducing the lecturer and then leaving the platform, the jury found that the lectures were entertainments or amusements within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act.

C Held: the solicitor was not the "keeper" of the hall nor were the other two persons "managing or conducting" the entertainment within the meaning of the Act, and, therefore, they were not liable to the penalties imposed by the Act.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of MATHEW, J., on further consideration after trial with a jury in Middlesex. The facts are set out in the headnote.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., and C. M. Chapman for the plaintiff.

Robson, Q.C., and Corrie Grant for the defendants.

E LORD ESHER, M.R.—I have no doubt at all what our decision ought to be. The Sunday Observance Act, 1780, which is a penal Act, ought to be construed strictly and applied strictly. The first question is whether the defendant Wilson was the "keeper" of this hall within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act. The jury found that what took place was an "entertainment" within the meaning of the F Act. We have, therefore, to see whether the defendant Wilson was the keeper of this hall which was to be deemed to be a disorderly house.

G He had been the secretary of the company which owned the hall, and, if the company had continued to exist, the company and not he would have been the letter of the hall. After the company went into liquidation the defendant Wilson ceased to be the secretary, and he did not become secretary under the liquidator, because the liquidator did not so appoint him. He was a solicitor, and appears to have assisted and advised the liquidator, he let the hall to the Leeds Sunday Lecture Society on behalf of the liquidator. Even if he had himself let the hall, he would not have been the "keeper" of the hall; not even if he had let it for the very purpose of giving an "entertainment," or in such a way that the tenant might use it for the illegal purpose. In such cases the tenant is the H keeper of the hall. Therefore, the defendant Wilson was in no sense the "keeper" of the hall. He had a licence for music and dancing in the hall, in order that he might be able to use it for that purpose on days other than Sunday, but that fact is quite immaterial.

I Then did he "appear, act, or behave himself as master," or "as the person having the care, government, or management" of the hall so as to be deemed to be the keeper thereof within s. 2 of the Act? I think not, for he did nothing more than let the hall. The case against him, therefore, entirely fails.

As to the other defendants, Ward and King. Ward was made the chairman of the meeting, that is, of the audience, but, as such, he had no power to arrange, alter or interfere with the entertainment. Even if he had power to prevent disorderly conduct, that was no part of the entertainment. He was, therefore, in no sense the person "managing" or conducting such entertainment or amusement, or acting as master of the ceremonies so as to be liable to a penalty under the Act. The same observations apply to King, who was chairman at the second lecture. The plaintiff has proceeded against the wrong persons, and his appeal must be dismissed. A

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Sunday Observance Act, 1780, is a penal statute, and it is a well-established rule that, in proceedings under such statutes, the persons proceeded against must be clearly brought within the description given by the statute of persons who are liable to the penalty. First, as to the defendant Wilson, it is said that he is liable, because he was the “keeper” of the hall. In my opinion, he only let the hall as the agent of the liquidator of the company which was in liquidation. If Wilson were liable, any house agent who let a house which was used for an entertainment of this kind would be liable. The lecture for which this hall was let might have been as dull as anything could possibly be; and Wilson did not know what the nature of the lecture would be. Then it is said that the other two defendants are liable as the persons “managing or conducting such entertainment or amusement.” They were the chairmen only, and, in my opinion, had nothing to do with the entertainment. The entertainment was in the hands of others, and the chairmen could not control the entertainment in any way. The Leeds Sunday Lecture Society controlled the entertainment. These defendants are not within the statute, and cannot be made liable to penalties. B

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There was not sufficient proved against the defendant Wilson. In such an action as this, the plaintiff must prove conclusively that the case comes within the statute. As to the other defendants, everything was disproved in their case. They were not managing or conducting the entertainment at all. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed. E

Sale of Land—Vendor in possession—Duty of vendor—Damage to land by trespasser—Completion of contract by purchaser in ignorance of damage—Purchaser's right to claim compensation from vendor. H

Where a vendor of land remains in possession of it until completion and payment of the purchase-money, he is in the position of a trustee for the purchaser to use reasonable care to keep the land in a reasonable state of preservation.

A vendor of land remained in possession of it after the contract of sale had been entered into and while he was in possession, a stranger removed large quantities of soil from the land without the knowledge or authority of either the vendor or the purchaser. After completion had taken place and the purchase-money had been paid, the purchaser claimed compensation from the vendor. I

Held: the action was maintainable, notwithstanding that the land had been conveyed to the purchaser.

Application by the defendant for judgment or for a new trial.

F The plaintiff, the purchaser of the fee simple of a plot of land at Southend, brought an action against the defendant, the vendor, for wrongfully allowing one Jackson to remove from it several hundred cartloads of soil while it was in the defendant's possession. The contract of sale entered into between the plaintiff and defendant on Aug. 2, 1889, provided that the sale should be completed on Aug. 12, 1889, but the conveyance was not executed till Oct. 21, on which day the plaintiff paid the balance of the purchase money. The defendant remained in possession of the land from the date of the contract of sale until Oct. 21. In September, 1889, Jackson removed from the piece of land several hundreds of cartloads of soil, neither the plaintiff nor defendant having given him any authority to do so, nor being aware at the time of the execution of the conveyance to the plaintiff that any soil had been taken away from the land. Some time after the conveyance had been executed, the plaintiff discovered that the soil had been taken away, and he thereupon commenced the present action.

H At the trial before GRANTHAM, J., the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the learned judge gave judgment for him accordingly.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and R. M. Bray for the defendant.

Jelf, Q.C., and Stewart-Smith for the plaintiff.

I LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—The point which we have now to decide in this case is whether this action will lie. The plaintiff's claim appears to me to rest on the rule that, in the case of a contract for the purchase and sale of land, the vendor remaining in possession between the time of the contract and the execution of the conveyance is in the position of a trustee for the purchaser, and, as such, has duties to perform towards him, not exactly the same as in the case of other trustees, but certain duties, one of which is to use reasonable care to keep the property in a reasonable state of preservation, and, so far as may be, as it was when the contract was made. Of course, if the vendor remains in possession for a long time and deterioration of the property takes place, other considerations may come in; but that is not the case here, where the injury complained of is the removal of the soil by a stranger. A

Phillips v. Silvester (1) is stated by MR. DART in his book on VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (6th Edn.), p. 734, to have been disapproved of by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., but the doctrine that the vendor in possession is, under such circumstances, a trustee for the purchaser was afterwards entirely acquiesced in by him in Earl of Egmont v. Smith (2). Phillips v. Silvester (1) is a decision in which we not only agree, but which is binding on us. It lays down in clear terms that there is such a duty as I have mentioned incumbent on a vendor in possession after a contract for sale. If so, it is clear that in the present case, there has been a breach of it, because the defendant has taken no care of the property. C It was argued for him that no care was, under the circumstances, a reasonable care, but that argument cannot possibly be supported. Then it was contended that the execution of the conveyance put an end to any remedy for the breach of trust. If the purchaser had known what had happened, it might possibly have been argued that his taking the conveyance without making any claim was evidence of a waiver of his rights; but, since neither the plaintiff nor defendant here knew anything about what had happened, I cannot see any ground whatever for this contention. D It appears to me to be clear on principle and on the authority of the decision in Phillips v. Silvester (1), followed as it has been by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Earl of Egmont v. Smith (2) and by KEKEWICH, J., in Royal Bristol Permanent Building Society v. Bomash (3), that this action is maintainable, and the application must be dismissed. E

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that a vendor remaining in possession of the property after a contract for sale, as the defendant did, is bound to take some care to preserve it, and here the defendant took none. It was argued for him that this case was like those where it was a question of allowing compensation under the contract in respect of misdescription of property, and matters of that kind, and that, when the conveyance was executed, there was an end of all remedy for the breach of trust. F It is true that the execution of the conveyance puts an end to all contractual obligations which are intended to be satisfied by the execution. But that doctrine does not apply to cases where the contractual obligation is of such a kind that it cannot be supposed to have been the intention of the parties that it should be extinguished by the conveyance. G Can it be said that the breach of an obligation arising between the making of the contract and the conveyance was intended to be satisfied by the execution of the conveyance? That must depend on circumstances. One circumstance that must be material is whether the breach of duty in question was known to the parties. If it was not, as in the present case, it is impossible to suppose that they intended the conveyance to operate as a waiver or release.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. In this case, the purchaser has not got the whole of what he contracted to buy. If that has happened through no fault of his own, it would seem to be good sense that he should be able to say that he has not got it, and, therefore, that he claims compensation. If the vendor could show that it was the purchaser's fault that he had not got what he bargained for, that might be a good answer. But, in the present case, the plaintiff says that he knew nothing about what was happening, and that it was the fault of the defendant. H The fact was that, after the contract and before completion, someone removed a large quantity of the soil, and the defendant not only did not prevent such removal, but took no care to prevent it. I cannot doubt that that amounts to negligence on the part of the defendant when I consider what the position of a vendor, situated as this vendor was, has been held to be by the decisions. Phillips v. Silvester (1) and Earl of Egmont v. Smith (2) clearly establish the proposition that, for some purposes a vendor in possession after a contract for I

A the sale of land is in the position of a trustee for the purchaser. He has certain duties towards the purchaser, one of which is—I am only putting into my own words what the decided cases have established—to take reasonable care that the property is not deteriorated before completion, and while it is in his possession as such trustee. Here no such care was taken, and, therefore, there was a breach of the duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff.

B It was also argued strenuously that, although the parties at the time knew nothing about what had happened, the fact of the plaintiff's having taken a conveyance of the land deprives him of any remedy. The proposition must be that, though he had a remedy before he took the conveyance, yet, because he took the conveyance without asserting his rights, he lost his remedy. I could understand that, if he took the conveyance with his eyes open, knowing what

C the state of the property was at the time, and did not make any claim; such conduct might—I do not say it would, but it might be argued that it would—amount to a waiver of his right. But that is not the present case; here the plaintiff knew nothing about what had happened. I cannot see any reason why, under these circumstances, the conveyance should deprive him of the right which he had previously, but of which he was ignorant, and, therefore, could not have intended to waive. No authority has been cited in support of the proposition

D contended for, and I am glad to think that there is none.

Another point argued was that this removal of soil happened after the time fixed for completion, and that there was a difference as regards the duty of the vendor towards the purchaser between the time before and the time after the date fixed for completion. Certain dicta were referred to for the purpose of showing

E this. But this was a contract under which it was plainly not the intention of either party that the purchaser should have possession until the completion took place, and the purchase-money was paid. It is rare for a contract for the sale of land to give the purchaser the right to possession before completion, and whenever it is intended, it is always expressed most explicitly. There is nothing in the terms of this contract which would give a right to possession before

F completion and payment of the purchase-money. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that there is no difference in this case, so far as the duty of the defendant is concerned, between the time before and the time after the date fixed for completion, and that his duty was as described until the purchase was completed. For these reasons, it appears to me that the action is maintainable.

Divorce—Maintenance of wife—Permanent maintenance—Insertion in order of dum sola et casta clause—Matters to be considered.

When an order is made by the Divorce Court granting permanent maintenance to a wife, there is no rule that the dum sola et casta clause ought to be inserted unless there is some reason to the contrary, nor that it ought to be omitted unless there is some reason for inserting it. The court must in each case determine what is reasonable, taking the following circumstances into account: (i) the conduct of the parties, (ii) their position in life, their ages, and their respective means, (iii) the amount of the provision actually made, (iv) the existence or non-existence of children, and who is to have the care and custody of them, and (v) any other circumstances which may be important in the particular case.

Appeal by the wife from an order of JEUNE, J., dated Mar. 24, 1891.

On Jan. 2, 1884, the petitioner, then a spinster, aged twenty-four, married the respondent, aged twenty-five; there was no issue of the marriage. On Aug. 6, 1890, a decree nisi was made, on the grounds of the adultery and cruelty of the husband. The decree was made absolute on Feb. 17, 1891. The parties were agreed that there should be an order for permanent maintenance at the rate of £60 a year. It was contended, on the part of the husband, that he was entitled to have a dum sola et casta clause inserted in the order. The wife objected to this as not usual. Both parties admitted that the court could order the insertion of the clause, but the wife said that it lay on the husband to show some special reason

A why it should be inserted, while the husband said it lay on the wife to show some special reason for its non-insertion. Neither counsel for the wife nor for the husband suggested any special reason for departing from the ordinary practice, and each of them relied on the ordinary practice as being in his favour. The registrar in his report referred to the following cases as bearing on the question: Fisher v. Fisher; Sidney v. Sidney; Gladstone v. Gladstone; Hart v. Hart; Medley v. Medley; Harrison v. Harrison; Lister v. Lister, and continued: From these cases, I think it appears to have formerly been the ordinary practice to make the guilty husband provide maintenance for his wife only while she was chaste and unmarried. The later cases show, however, a tendency to alter this, and I think that the court does not now impose on the wife's right to maintenance the condition dum sola et casta, unless there are some special circumstances requiring it. I submit to the court, therefore, that, in the present case, the order should be made without any such condition. I should, perhaps, point out that, though both counsel decline to rely on any special circumstances, the smallness of the amount payable to the wife in this case is, I think, a circumstance in favour of the wife's contention, rather than that of the husband's."

D JEUNE, J., confirmed the registrar's report except as to the dum sola et casta clause, which he was of the opinion ought to be inserted.

T. Terrell for the wife.

Bayford, Q.C., and Barnard for the husband.

LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: The court has a discretion both as to the amount to be paid and as to the time for which, and the conditions on which, the payment shall continue. The court has constantly disclaimed a right to fetter the exercise by any judge of a discretion by Act of Parliament vested in him; but where a judge, in coming to a decision in a particular case, has apparently been guided by some supposed rule which this court thinks erroneous, or has overlooked some material fact, this court has not shrunk from acting on its own view, and reversing the decision in question. The court, in truth, cannot act otherwise without abandoning its functions as a court of re-hearing and of appeal. In this case, it appears to us that JEUNE, J., has proceeded on the assumption that the dum sola et casta clause ought to be inserted, unless there is some reason to the contrary. In our opinion, there is no rule to this effect, nor is there any rule that the clause ought to be omitted unless there is some reason for inserting it. There is no rule one way or the other, nor ought there to be any; each case ought to depend on its own circumstances.

G The jurisdiction is given to the court by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866, the preamble of which contains a recital that, by s. 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, it was enacted that

H "The court may, on pronouncing any decree for a dissolution of marriage, order that the husband shall to the satisfaction of the court secure to the wife such gross or annual sum of money as to the court may seem reasonable, and for that purpose may refer it to one of the conveyancing counsel of the Court of Chancery to settle and approve of a proper deed to be executed by all necessary parties. And whereas it sometimes happens that a decree for a dissolution of marriage is obtained against a husband who has no property on which the payment of any such gross or annual sum can be secured, but nevertheless he would be able to make a monthly or weekly payment to the wife during their joint lives."

I Then it is enacted, by s. 1, that

"In every such case it shall be lawful for the court to make an order on the husband for payment to the wife during their joint lives of such monthly or weekly sums for her maintenance and support as the court may think reasonable: Provided always, that if the husband shall afterwards from any cause become unable to make such payments it shall be lawful for the court to discharge or modify the order, or temporarily to suspend the same as to the whole or any part of the money so ordered to be paid and again to revive the same order, wholly or in part, as to the court may seem fit."

What is reasonable for the maintenance and support of the wife for the joint lives of the husband and wife is, therefore, what has in each case to be ascertained. The circumstances which have to be taken into account are (i) the conduct of the parties; (ii) their position in life and their ages and their respective means; (iii) the amount of the provision actually made; (iv) the existence or non-existence of children, and who is to have the care and custody of them; (v) any other circumstances which may be important in any particular case.

In the case now before the court, there are no children, and no particular circumstances in addition to those which fall under the first three heads. We have, therefore, only to consider those heads. As regards the conduct of the parties, the wife was the petitioner, and nothing is, or can be, said against her. The misconduct of her husband drove her to seek for a divorce. This is very material in considering whether the words dum casta should be inserted, for, although on the one hand, as forcibly pointed out by JEUNE, J., it is unjust to make an allowance cease on marriage, and not on illicit intercourse, yet, on the other hand, it is an insult to any woman of spotless character to provide against the contingency of her sinking so low as to render such a provision necessary. This view of the question is quite as important as the other.

As regards the position of the parties and their respective means, much must turn on those matters. The least that a man ought to do for the maintenance and support of his wife, when he so disregards his own duties to his wife as to drive her from home without any fault on her part, and practically force her to obtain a divorce, is to do what he can, consistently with his means, to maintain her in reasonable comfort, having regard to her age, health and position in society. Both the amount which he ought to allow her, and the duration of such allowance, ought to be fixed with reference to this consideration. The amount of her property, if any, ought obviously to be taken into consideration. If, as in this case, the husband's means are such that he can only allow his wife a bare subsistence, and she has nothing, it seems to us unjust to her that even this subsistence money should cease merely because she may marry again. The continuance of the allowance may conduce very materially to her marrying, and to her future comfort and happiness. On the other hand, justice to him does not, in our opinion, require the cessation of so small an allowance on her marrying again. Under the circumstances, therefore, of this case, viz., the innocence of the wife, the misconduct of the husband, the fact that the wife has no property, and the smallness of the allowance made to her—it appears to us that the clause dum sola et casta vixerit should be struck out. The husband must pay the costs of the wife's application and of the appeal.

Licence—Music and dancing—Hearing by county council of application for renewal of licence—Bias—Presence of councillors opposing application by counsel.

The London County Council delegated to a committee of their body the hearing of applications for music and dancing licences. The committee by a majority recommended that two applications for the renewal of licences for public-houses should not be granted. The applicants thereupon applied to the county council for the licences. At the hearing before the county council certain members of the committee who had voted against the granting of the licences instructed counsel to appear for them before the county council and oppose the applications. Those councillors were also present at the hearing, but they did not vote. The council by a majority refused the applications.

Held: in determining the applications the county council were acting judicially and were bound by the ordinary principles of justice in deciding questions which came before them for judicial decision; accordingly, the presence of those members of the council at the hearing who had instructed counsel to oppose the applications vitiated the proceedings, and rules for writs of mandamus to hear and determine the applications according to law would be made absolute.

Rules Nisi for writs of mandamus.

In R. v. London County Council, Ex parte Akkersdyk, a rule nisi had been obtained, on the application of John Akkersdyk, calling on the London County Council to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding the council to hear and determine according to law an application by Akkersdyk for a licence for music and dancing in respect of his premises, the Angel and Crown public-house. A similar rule nisi had been obtained in R. v. London County Council, Ex parte Fermentia, by Fermentia, in respect of an application made by him for a similar licence in respect of his premises, the Rose and Crown public-house, of which he was landlord. In both cases a rule nisi had also been obtained for a certiorari to bring up and quash the resolution of the county council refusing the licences. G

Dec. 16, 1891. A. L. SMITH, J., read the following judgment of the court.—In this case, John Akkersdyk obtained a rule nisi calling on the London County Council to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding the council to hear and determine his application for a licence for music and dancing in respect of his premises, the Angel and Crown public-house, in the Liberty of the Tower, and also why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up a resolution of the council refusing such licence. The real question we have to determine is, whether the London County Council have heard and determined Akkersdyk's application according to law. If yes, then the rule must be discharged; aliter if they have not. I

A For many years prior to the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, which created county councils, Akkersdyk had applied for and obtained from the county justices sitting in quarter sessions a music and dancing licence for his premises. By this Act (s. 3) the administrative business of quarter sessions in respect of the licensing of houses for music and dancing was transferred to the county council. The council were not authorised to administer an oath, or to perform any judicial
B business, or otherwise act as justices of the peace (s. 78). By s. 28, the council had power to delegate to a committee, with or without restrictions or conditions, any powers or duties transferred to them. After this Act was passed, the county council continued to grant renewals of the licence to Akkersdyk, and last year required structural and other alterations to be executed, amounting to £1,000, at the same time informing him that the execution of such works would not give
C him any right to a subsequent renewal. Akkersdyk executed the works according to the requisition of the architect of the council.

On Oct. 1, 1891, Akkersdyk again applied to the licensing committee of the county council sitting at Clerkenwell for a renewal of his licence. After some evidence had been heard, he was informed by the chairman that the majority of the committee were not satisfied as to the house, and that they could not recommend D the council to grant the renewal, but that it was open to him to appeal to the London County Council, who would sit on Oct. 23, 1891. Akkersdyk accordingly appeared by counsel before the county council sitting in licensing sessions at Spring Gardens.

It is erroneous to say that this was an appeal. It was no such thing. It was an original hearing by the London County Council of the applicant's application for
E what is called a renewal of the music and dancing licence, the council having before them the report of their committee of what they had done at Clerkenwell. Akkersdyk, by his counsel, protested against the decision of the committee, and insisted that nothing had been proved against him to disentitle him to a renewal of the licence. At this time, Mr. M'Dougall, Mr. Beachcroft, and Mr. Leon, three of the committee who had voted against Akkersdyk at Clerkenwell, were sitting on
F the London County Council, adjudicating on his case, Mr. M'Dougall taking a somewhat active part in the discussion thereon. It then, for the first time, appeared that these three councillors were not only adjudicating on the applicant's case, but had themselves, together with another of the committee who had voted against the applicant (viz., Mr. Lidgett), retained counsel and solicitors to appear before the council to press the case against him, and uphold, if they
G could, their vote on the committee at Clerkenwell. Hence the present rule nisi for a mandamus to hear and determine the applicant's application according to law.

Counsel for the London County Council very frankly admitted that, if what had taken place in this case had taken place when justices were sitting in quarter sessions, he could not have resisted the mandamus. He admitted, and it has been
H so held, that the presence of one interested justice would render the court improperly constituted and vitiate the proceedings, it being no answer to the objection that there was a majority in favour of the decision without reckoning the vote of the interested party: see R. v. Hertfordshire Justices (1); but counsel argued that the London County Council were an elected body and not justices sitting in quarter sessions; and in this we agree. It is true that, by the Disorderly Houses Act, 1751, justices (and now by the Local Government Act, 1888, the county council) are authorised to grant or refuse a licence as they "in their discretion shall think proper," but the discretion is to be exercised, as LORD HALSBURY put it in Sharp v. Wakefield (2) ([1891] A.C. at p. 179), "according to the rules of reason and justice." In our judgment, the London County Council are adjudicating as to whether a man is or is not to be deprived of his licence; and, to follow the words of COTTON, L.J., in Leeson v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration (3), "though not in the ordinary sense judges, they have to decide judicially as to whether or not the complaint is well founded." In our judgment, when so acting they are not emancipated from the ordinary principles on which justice is administered in this kingdom, and which are, as has been said, founded on its very essence. A

Counsel conceded that, if the London County Council adjudicated in a matter of a music and dancing licence against an applicant without hearing him, such an adjudication could not stand. He also admitted that, if any of the council adjudicating had a pecuniary interest in the subject-matter, such adjudication also could not stand. Then why is an adjudication in which gentlemen have acted both as judges and accusers at the same time to be upheld? There is a sequence of authority holding that it cannot be, and it suffices to quote a passage from the judgment of COTTON, L.J., in Leeson v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration (3), in which he says (43 Ch.D. at p. 379): B

"Of course the rule is very plain that no man can be plaintiff, or prosecutor in any action, and at the same time sit in judgment to decide in that particular case either in his own case, or in any case, where he brings forward the accusation or complaint on which the order is made;" C and yet this is precisely what, in the present case, the three councillors have done. But it was argued that, after it had appeared that they were in fact both accusers and judges, they no longer took part in the deliberations of the council. This, however, will not avail even if it were the fact, for LORD DENMAN, in R. v. Hertfordshire Justices (1) held that a decision was vitiated by any one interested person taking part, it being enough for the purpose that one single interested person has formed part of the court; and PATESON, J., who followed LORD DENMAN, said (6 Q.B. at p. 757): "The question is, has an interested person taken any part at all?" R. v. Meyer (4) is also an authority. BLACKBURN, J., in delivering judgment, said (1 Q.B.D. at p. 177): D

"We cannot go into [the question whether the interested justice took no part in the discussion of the case]. The question is, was he so interested in the matter as that he ought not to have sat?" E

In this statement of the law we agree.

A further point was taken for the London County Council that the applicant had waived any objection to the three councillors sitting on his case, and authorities were cited to show that, if there was such a waiver, mandamus would not go. We do not doubt the authorities, but we are clear that there was no waiver in fact. It is true that when Akkersdyk arrived at the council in Spring Gardens, he might, and probably did, see the three councillors he had seen previously sitting on the committee; but neither he nor his solicitor then knew anything of counsel being present on their retainer to press the case against him. In our judgment, the London County Council show no good cause against this rule, and mandamus must go to them to hear and determine Akkersdyk's application according to law. We understand that in this and the subsequent case (about which hereafter) counsel consent to the rules for a certiorari being abandoned without costs. G

In R. v. L.C.C., Ex parte Fermentia the salient facts are almost identical with those in the case of Akkersdyk, with the exception that Fermentia had spent £1,135 on alterations according to the requirements of the architect of the London County Council, and that the evidence before the committee was altogether in his favour. The decision of the committee was as follows: H

"The decision of the committee is the same in this case as it was in the last [i.e., Akkersdyk's]. They do not recommend the council to grant a renewal. It will be open to you to appeal to the council on Oct. 23." I

This case came on before the council immediately after Akkersdyk's, and was in reality a continuation of it. The learned counsel for the four councillors pressed the case against Fermentia, as he had done against Akkersdyk, and with the same result. It was argued in this case that the three councillors "had left the bench," a term well known in the administration of justice, and, consequently, that they were no longer judges as well as accusers. It is true, as appears from the

A shorthand-writer's notes, that none of the three councillors took any open active part in the discussion of this case, as Mr. M'Dougall had done in Akkersdyk's case. It was sworn, however, by Henry Souch (clerk to the applicant's solicitor) that, on several occasions while the case was proceeding, he saw Mr. M'Dougall, Mr. Beachcroft, and Mr. Leon standing or sitting in the council chamber, and that, on one of such occasions, he saw Mr. Leon sitting immediately behind the official seat of Mr. Fardell, the chairman of the licensing committee, and conversing with other members of the London County Council.

B Mr. Leon, in his affidavit in answer, does not deny being in the council chamber, but states that, during the discussion, he was not in that part of the chamber in which councillors who are taking part in the proceedings sit. He admits that he may have conversed occasionally with other members who came and spoke to him there. He does not, however, state what they spoke about, but he adds that he did not attempt to influence their votes. Mr. Beachcroft limits his attendance in the council chamber to one or other of the doorways, and Mr. M'Dougall states that he sat on the dais behind the seat of the chairman, which is the place for visitors, and not where councillors who are taking part in the proceedings sit. In the affidavit of Mr. M'Dougall, handed up to us as originally drafted for him to swear, it is stated:

"I may have conversed occasionally with the members who came and spoke to me there; but I did not attempt to influence their votes, and I left the council chamber before, and was not present during the show of hands."

E This paragraph is struck out before Mr. M'Dougall swore to this affidavit, and it is deposed to with the paragraph erased. It should be noticed that it appears from the shorthand notes that Mr. Ford, who addressed the council, considered that the three councillors were still taking part in the proceedings.

F In our judgment, if members of such a body as the London County Council, consisting as it does of 139 persons, and sitting in a building like that of Spring Gardens, desire to retain counsel on their behalf to press accusations against applicants for licences, or others before the council, they should either absent themselves altogether from the precincts of the building, or sit in such a position with their counsel that it may be known to all who the real accusers are, and we think that they do not "leave the bench" if they remain in the positions in which the three councillors did on this occasion.

G In our judgment, these two cases, conducted as they have been throughout, are in reality one, the one case being referred to in the other, and what we have said about waiver in the Akkersdyk case is applicable in this case: see R. v. Great Yarmouth Justices (5). A mandamus must also go in this case as in Akkersdyk's to hear and determine Fermentia's application according to law.

HARRISON v. DUKE OF RUTLAND AND OTHERS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.), November 10, December 3, 1892]

Highway—User—Rights of public—Right to pass and re-pass—Use for any other purpose—Trespass.

When a highway is dedicated to the public the easement acquired by the public is a right of passage, a right to pass and re-pass along the highway at their pleasure for the purpose of legitimate travel, and the use of the highway for any other purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, is an infringement of the rights of the owner of the soil, who has not transferred the absolute property of the soil of the highway, but, subject to the easement, has precisely the same estate in the soil as he had before the easement was acquired by the public, and constitutes the person using the highway for a purpose other than to exercise the right of passage a trespasser as against the owner of the soil of the highway.

The defendant was the owner of a moor across which ran a highway, the ownership of the soil of which was in the defendant. On an occasion when the defendant, with a party of friends, was lawfully engaged in shooting grouse on the land adjoining the highway, the plaintiff, for the express purpose of annoying the defendant and incommoding him in the exercise of his rights, and for no other purpose, went on the highway and tried in various ways to divert the grouse, which were being driven towards the highway and in the direction of the butts, where the defendant and his friends were stationed. The plaintiff refused to cease what he was doing, and certain keepers of the defendant, by his orders, held the plaintiff down on the ground till the drive was over. In an action by the plaintiff for assault and false imprisonment,

Held: the plaintiff was a trespasser on the highway, and (per LOPES and KAY, L.J., LORD ESHER, M.R., dissenting) a declaration would be made to that effect.

C Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial on appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial of the action before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and a jury. There was a similar cross motion by the defendants on certain issues in the claim and on the counterclaim.

The plaintiff in person.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., and R. M. Bray for the defendants.

D Dec. 3, 1892. The following judgments were read.

LORD ESHER, M.R. In this case the plaintiff has brought an action against the Duke of Rutland, and other persons who have acted under the duke's authority, for assault and false imprisonment. The defendants justified and alternatively paid five shillings into court; the duke also put forward a counterclaim. The case was tried before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and a jury. The jury gave a verdict for the defendants on the claim, and on the counterclaim the Lord Chief Justice directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The plaintiff has now appealed to this court, on the ground that the verdict on the claim was wrong, and the duke has appealed in respect of the judgment on the counterclaim.

The facts of the case are not in dispute. The Duke of Rutland had the right of shooting over certain moors, and on the occasion in question he was exercising that right. The plaintiff went on a highway crossing these moors, knowing that it passed close to the place where the duke, with his friends, on his own land was exercising his undoubted right. The land each side of this highway belonged to the duke, and the soil of the highway was, therefore, vested in him. The plaintiff went on the highway, not for the purpose of going to or coming from, anywhere, and not for the purpose of using the highway for any other object than to incommode the duke and his friends in the exercise of their rights of shooting. That was the plaintiff's sole purpose. He went on the highway near the butts to which he knew the game would be driven, so that as the butts were not far distant from the highway he would necessarily interfere with the drive. He then interfered further by waving his pocket handkerchief, by opening and shutting his umbrella, and in other ways. He was asked to desist, but he refused. The duke's servants then forcibly laid hands on him and held him down on the ground for the purpose of preventing his further interference, until he could not interfere any longer, that is to say, until the drive was over. That was their only purpose, and they held him down only for that period. It is clear that they did not use any greater degree of violence than was necessary to carry out their purpose, because when one of the keepers said to the plaintiff that he hoped they were not hurting him, the plaintiff in reply asked him to sing him a song. However, the defendants paid five shillings into court, alternatively to their plea justifying the assault, on the ground that the plaintiff was trespassing on the duke's land and interfering with his enjoyment of it, and that no more force was used than was necessary under the circumstances. Besides that issue there was, therefore, an alternative one—whether, if the assault was illegal, five shillings was enough damages.

On the claim the jury found a general verdict for the defendants. That might mean that, even if there was an excess of force used, the five shillings paid into court was enough. The Lord Chief Justice being anxious to maintain to their fullest extent the rights of the public over highways—and in this I fully sympathise with him—without taking into consideration some other matters which should have been considered, directed the jury as a matter of law that the plaintiff was not trespassing on the duke's land, that is to say, on the highway. Notwithstanding that, the judgment on the claim must be right because the jury have found that five shillings is enough if there had been an excess of force. But that direction of the Lord Chief Justice prevented a verdict on the issue whether the plaintiff was a trespasser, and on that issue judgment has been entered for the plaintiff. The direction also prevented any verdict for the duke on the counterclaim, and judgment has been accordingly entered on it for the plaintiff. Under these circumstances the plaintiff has appealed against the finding of the jury, but from what I have said I think it is obvious that this appeal cannot be entertained and his appeal, therefore, fails. On the defendants' cross-appeal, we have been asked to enter a verdict for the defendants on the issue of justification on the claim, and a verdict and judgment for the duke on the counterclaim. As to the result of that, I cannot doubt that a verdict must be entered for the defendants on the issue of justification, and on the counterclaim there must be a verdict for the duke if asked for, at least for nominal damages. As to another claim which is made in the counterclaim I will deal with that presently.

My great difficulty is to express the reasons for my judgment so carefully as to uphold the law in favour of the defendants without so stating them as to make the decision of the court interfere with the rights of the public on a highway. That the defendants in this case were taking a very delicate course seems to me clear. The plaintiff was undoubtedly on the highway; he was not merely told to move on, but was actually in point of law imprisoned for a time. That is a very strong proceeding, and a person who does such a thing is in considerable jeopardy in a civil action. The soil of this highway is the duke's property, and he, therefore, says that the plaintiff was trespassing on his land. The question is whether the plaintiff was a trespasser.

What is the true rule of law with regard to the user of a highway? It has been laid down in R. v. Pratt (1). At the trial of this action the Lord Chief Justice took exception to the ruling in that case as being a criminal case, but the decision really depended on the question whether the prisoner was or was not a trespasser, and the judges were obliged to say whether or not he had committed a trespass. The land in question in that case was a highway, and the prosecutor was the owner of the soil. The prisoner was charged with trespassing on land in pursuit of game. He did not go on the highway for the purpose of using it as a highway, but solely for the purpose of searching for game. Lord CAMPBELL, C.J., says in that case (4 E. & B. at p. 865) that Pratt

“was beyond all controversy on land, the soil and freehold of which was in the owner of the adjoining land, that is Mr. Bowyer. It is true the public had a right of way there, but, subject to that right, the soil and every right incident to the ownership of the soil was in Mr. Bowyer. The road, therefore, must be considered as Mr. Bowyer's land. Then Pratt, being on that land, was undoubtedly a trespasser if he went there, not in exercise of the right of way, but for the purpose of seeking game and that only. If he did go there for that purpose only, he committed the offence named in the Act; he trespassed by being on the land in pursuit of game.”

Therefore, if a man goes on part of a highway the soil of which part belongs to the owner of the adjoining land, not for the purpose of using it as a highway, but only for some other purpose, whether it be “lawful or unlawful,” as CROMPTON, J., says in the same case, then in so using that part of the highway he is a trespasser. R. v. Pratt (1) is authority for that proposition, and the case is founded on earlier authorities. Therefore, on the ground that the plaintiff was

- A on the highway on soil belonging to the Duke of Rutland, not for the purpose of passing or re-passing or of using the highway in any reasonable mode of using a highway as a highway, he was a trespasser. But I must say that if the language used by ERLE and CROMPTON, JJ., in R. v. Pratt (1) is construed too largely, it would interfere mischievously with the rights of the public on a highway. If that language is construed strictly, a person doing anything else on a highway but pass or re-pass is a trespasser. But I do not think that the law is that the public must always be passing and doing nothing else on a highway. There are many things often done and usually done on a highway by the public, and if a person does not transgress any such usual and reasonable mode of using a highway, I do not think he is a trespasser. That seems to me to show that the rights of the owner of the soil are not very large. If a person is passing
- C along a road over soil belonging to a particular owner, in order to do something beyond the part of the soil of the highway belonging to that owner, then he is only passing along the highway, and whatever he may have an intention of doing afterwards further on, he is not then a trespasser, nor can the owner of the soil interfere with him on that ground. So, if a person is using a highway merely for passing along it, and he afterwards goes into other land belonging
- D to the same owner as the soil of the highway belongs to, then I think he could not be said to be a trespasser while he is passing along the highway, though he was passing with the intention of committing a trespass upon other land of the owner of the soil of the highway. But in the case we have now to deal with, the plaintiff was using part of the highway merely for the purpose of infringing the rights of the owner of the soil on other land belonging to him.
- E He did not go on to the duke's private land, he remained on the highway and interfered from there. He was using the highway, not for the purpose of passing and re-passing along it or in any other ordinary and usual mode in which the public use a highway. That is clear from the evidence, and under these circumstances I think he was a trespasser.

It is clear that the question may arise in many cases whether in a particular

F instance a person was using a highway in a reasonable and usual way, and that would be a question for a jury. In the present case the Lord Chief Justice ruled that the plaintiff was not a trespasser, and I think that we are bound to say that he was a trespasser. Therefore, on the cross-appeal we must say that a verdict must be entered for the defendants on the issue of justification. There will, therefore, be a verdict for the defendants on the whole claim, and the

G plaintiff's appeal must be dismissed.

As to the counterclaim, I fear I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brethren. In the pleadings the Duke of Rutland asked for an injunction, at the Bar we have been asked for a declaration. I have always had a disinclination to have the procedure of the Court of Chancery brought into an ordinary common law action. I think it a misfortune that such procedure should be brought into

H a common law action, except perhaps in extreme cases. This action is about nothing but an ordinary trespass to land for which very small damages would be given and now damages are not even asked for. If an injunction were granted, and the plaintiff repeated the trespass, he would have to go to prison for an indefinite time. That seems to me a very severe procedure to bring into such an ordinary common law action as this. However, in this court the counsel for

I the defendants have not asked for an injunction, but have said that they will be satisfied with a declaration. What can be the use of a declaration without an injunction against such a man as the plaintiff? It should have been made, if made at all, by the judge at nisi prius. In such a case, the judge, after directing the jury that as a matter of law the plaintiff committed a trespass on the occasion in question, would say that, if the plaintiff trespassed again, the direction to the jury would be evidence against him. It seems to me that would be an unnecessary over-burdening of the case. A declaration may, no doubt, be very useful in many cases in Chancery where the decree of the court has to be carried out by other people, but, in my opinion, it is wholly misplaced in such an action as this. In every ordinary common law action, even in a case of assault, it is becoming usual now for the pleader to ask for an injunction. It only increases the expenses and overloads the matter with unnecessary complications. By the Judicature Act it was provided that when the principles of law and equity differed, those of equity should prevail, but it was not intended that the procedure in equity should prevail in common law actions.

In my opinion, therefore, no declaration ought to be made here, as I think it would be superabundant and overloading the case; but I agree that the judgment on the counterclaim cannot stand, and that judgment should be entered on it for the Duke of Rutland. I may add, that, in my judgment, I have in no way relied on the fact that the rights of the duke which were interfered with were sporting rights, the same result would have happened whatever were the nature of the rights. I think that the plaintiff's appeal fails, and the defendants' appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—This to my mind is a case of great importance. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] With great deference I am of opinion that the Lord Chief Justice was wrong in directing the jury that on the facts as admitted the plaintiff was not a trespasser. In my opinion, the Lord Chief Justice ought to have told the jury that the plaintiff on the admitted facts was a trespasser, and that the pleas justifying the trespass and the counterclaim must be found for the defendants, and that the only question they had to consider was whether there had been an excess of force used in abating the trespass, and, if so, whether five shillings was enough to compensate the plaintiff for such excess. The Lord Chief Justice ought further to have told the jury that, if there was no excess, then they must find everything for the defendants; but, if there was an excess, then, if five shillings was enough, they ought still to find everything for the defendants; but if, on the other hand, they thought five shillings was not enough, then they should find for the plaintiff for such sum as in their opinion he was entitled to beyond the five shillings. The jury were of opinion that five shillings was enough to cover everything to which the plaintiff was entitled. Their finding on that issue is, therefore, conclusive, and the verdict and judgment in that respect must stand. But ought the Lord Chief Justice to have told the jury that the plaintiff was not a trespasser? The interest of the public in a highway consists solely in the right of passage; the soil and freehold over which that right of way is exercised is vested in the owner or owners of the adjoining land, who may maintain actions of trespass against persons infringing his or their rights therein, as, for instance, by permitting cattle to depasture thereon.

[His Lordship then discussed Dovaston v. Payne (2) and R. v. Pratt (1) (see judgment of KAY, L.J., infra) and proceeded:] The conclusion which I draw from the authorities is that, if a person uses the soil of the highway for any purpose other than that in respect of which the dedication was made and the easement acquired, he is a trespasser. The easement acquired by the public is a right to pass and re-pass at their pleasure for the purpose of legitimate travel, and the use of the soil for any other purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, is an infringement of the rights of the owner of the soil who has, subject to this easement, precisely the same estate in the soil as he had previously to any easement being acquired by the public. If this is the law, the plaintiff on the admitted facts was a trespasser. He was using the soil of the highway not for the purpose of passing and re-passing, but for the purpose of interfering with the exercise of a legal right by the defendant, the Duke of Rutland. Counsel for the duke does not press for an injunction; if he had, I should have thought it ought to be granted, but he asks for a declaration that the plaintiff, on the facts appearing, was, at the time when he interfered with the legal right of the duke, a trespasser. This I think he ought to have. An injunction is constantly granted by the Queen's Bench Division for trespasses threatened to be repeated. It is the effect of the Judicature Act, and a most

A wholesome remedy. This action might have been brought in the Court of Chancery and an injunction on the facts appearing would, in my opinion, have been readily granted, and under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 5, there is full power to make a declaration such as we make.

B KAY, L.J.—The soil of a highway belongs prima facie to the owner of the land adjoining it. If the land on either side is the property of different owners, each is owner of the soil on his side ad medium filum of the highway. But this ownership is subject to the right of the public to use the highway. Any use of the soil of the highway other than the legitimate use of it for the purposes of a highway is a trespass upon that soil as against the owner to whom it still belongs.

C These propositions are amply established by judicial decisions. The only difficulty in applying them is in determining whether the particular act complained of is or is not a user of the soil as a highway. The legitimate use of a highway is generally described as a "right of passage," or a "right of passing and re-passing." In 1 ROLLE'S ABRIDGMENT 392 B. pl. 1, 2, referred to and adopted by LORD MANSFIELD in Goodtitle d. Chester v. Alker and Elmes (3), the law as to highways is there stated (1 Burr. at p. 143):

D "The King has nothing but the passage for himself and his people, but the freehold and all profits belong to the owner of the soil."

E In the last-mentioned case it was held that trespass would lie for any interference with the owner's rights in the soil of a highway, and that he may maintain ejectment for an exclusion as by a building upon the soil of the highway. In Sir John Lade v. Shepherd (4), an action of trespass was brought by the owner of the soil for building a bridge across a ditch, "the end whereof rested on the highway." The plaintiff had judgment, the court saying (2 Str. at p. 1004):

F "It is certainly a dedication to the public so far as the public has occasion for it, which is only for a right of passage. But it never was understood to be a transfer of the absolute property in the soil."

Following these decisions, the grass or trees growing on the sides of the highway are held to be the property of the owners of the soil: Turner v. Ringwood Highway Board (5); Curtis v. Kesteven County Council (6).

G The right of the public upon a highway is, in the language of the judges which I have quoted, described as a right of passage. In other cases it is defined as a right of passing and re-passing. Probably this is sufficiently accurate and precise to enable anyone to determine what, in each particular instance, is an improper use of the soil. Many of such instances may be too trivial to justify any action or prosecution. That is so in the case of every trespass. If a man walks into the field of another without permission, he is a trespasser; but an action for such a trespass, unless it were in assertion of a fancied right, would not be very likely to succeed. So, if by the side of a highway an artist set up his easel and made a sketch, he might be a trespasser. But no one in his senses would bring an action against him for an occasional trespass of that kind. There is no more danger of abuse of the law in the one case than in the other, and it is no argument against this well-settled law relating to highways, to say that it is capable of such abuse. The answer is that the law of trespass, whether on the soil of a highway or on land over which the public have no rights at all, may be pushed to an extreme in certain cases. But the discretion of a court of justice is as capable of controlling any excessive assertion of right in the case of a highway as in any other case.

I The other reported instances of trespass deserve consideration. In Dovaston v. Payne (2) cattle were taken by the defendant damage feasant on his land which adjoined to a highway. It was pleaded that, being on the highway, they had escaped into the land by reason of the owner not having kept the fence which divided it from the road in repair. The plea was held bad, because it did not aver distinctly that the cattle were using the highway for the purpose of passing and re-passing, so that they might have been trespassing upon it, and an escape from land on which they were trespassing would not be a defence. HEATH, J., said (2 Hy. Bl. at pp. 531, 532) that it was no excuse that the fences were out of repair if the cattle were trespassers, and it was necessary to show that they were lawfully using the road; for "the property is in the owner of the soil subject to an easement for the benefit of the public," and on the plea it did not appear "whether the cattle were passing and re-passing, or whether they were trespassing on the highway." In Stevens v. Whistler (7) it was held by the Court of King's Bench that depasturing cattle upon a highway, on one side of which the plaintiff had land, was a trespass on that part of the soil of the highway which belonged to the plaintiff.

In R. v. Pratt (1) it was decided that a person who went upon the high road with a gun and attempted to shoot a pheasant which flew over it, was properly convicted of a trespass in search of game, under the Game Act, 1831, s. 30 [repealed in part by the Protection of Birds Act, 1854, and the Game Laws (Amendment) Act, 1960], upon the soil of the highway which belonged to the owner of the close adjoining such highway. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., said (4 E. & B. at p. 865):

"He was on land the soil and freehold of which was in the owner of the adjoining land . . . It is true the public had a right of way there, but subject to that right the soil and every right incident to the ownership of the soil was in" the owner of the adjoining land. WIGHTMAN, J., said (ibid. at p. 867):

"Though the public have a right to pass and re-pass on land which is a highway, they have no right to use the land for any other purpose than as a highway, and the appellant, being on such land in pursuit of game, was prima facie a trespasser."

ERLE, J., said (ibid. at p. 868):

"It is said that he could not be a trespasser because it was a highway. But I take it to be clear law that if, in fact, a man be on land where the public have a right to pass and re-pass, not for the purpose of passing and re-passing, but for other and different purposes, he is in law a trespasser like the cattle in Dovaston v. Payne (2)."

CROMPTON, J., said (ibid. at pp. 868, 869):

"If a man use the land over which there is a right of way, for any purpose, lawful or unlawful, other than that of passing and re-passing, he is a trespasser."

These authorities were considered and followed by the Court of Queen's Bench in St. Mary, Newington, Vestry v. Jacobs (8), where the law is stated thus (L.R. 7 Q.B. at p. 47): "The owner who dedicates to public use as a highway a portion of his land parts with no other right than a right of passage to the public, and may exercise all other rights of ownership not inconsistent with such dedication." MELLOR, J., who delivered the judgment of the court, comments thus on R. v. Pratt (1) (ibid. at p. 55):

"Whether or not that case is open to doubt as to the construction put upon the Game Act, it truly expresses, as we think, the true limit of the public rights over a highway."

The court held that the owner of premises adjoining a highway, who had offered to take up the flags of a footpath and replace them by hard materials to enable him to cart heavy machinery into his yard, was not liable for damage done to the flags by carting the machinery over them, when his offer had been refused.

According to these authorities, the right of the public upon a highway is that of passing and re-passing over land the soil of which may be owned by a private

A person. Using that soil for any other purpose, lawful or unlawful, is a trespass. I understand those words to mean that the purpose need not be unlawful in itself, as, for example, to commit an assault or a felony upon the high road. It is enough that it should be a user of the soil of the high road for a purpose other than that which is the proper use of a highway, namely, that of passing and re-passing along it. The peculiarity of the decision in R. v. Pratt (1) is that the trespasser was passing along the highway, but his purpose in doing so made that passing a trespass. The purpose, however, was to do an act upon the highway itself which was beyond his right merely to pass and re-pass. If he had gone along the highway with the purpose of reaching a covert near the highway and taking game in that covert, though he might be a trespasser in that covert, I should not think he was a trespasser upon the highway. But, if a man goes along a highway for the purpose of cutting down the trees or bushes which grow along the side of it, or taking the grass, or setting up a show upon the highway, or doing upon the highway itself—in the words of CROMPTON, J.—any act, “lawful or unlawful, other than that of passing and re-passing, he is a trespasser.” The words must be read with the obvious qualification that the “purpose” they refer to must be a purpose of using the soil of the highway itself otherwise than by merely passing and re-passing.

In the present case the highway was a cart or carriage road across a moor. The Duke of Rutland had the right of sporting over the moor. The soil in it, and in the highway, I understand, belonged to him. He had butts, in which people stood to shoot grouse driven over them from the moor. These butts were some two hundred yards from the road, so that shooting from them would not infringe the provisions of s. 72 of the Highway Act, 1835, which prohibits any person from wantonly firing off any gun within fifty feet of the centre of any carriageway or cartway. Some old butts were within the prohibited distance. It was proved that the plaintiff went upon this high road during a grouse drive for the express purpose of preventing the grouse from flying towards the butts, and thus interfering with the right of sporting which was being exercised by the duke's friends. On this point the evidence was so conclusive that we are told the Lord Chief Justice said it was superfluous to produce any more witnesses to prove it. The keepers seized the plaintiff, threw him down upon the road, and held him there during the grouse drive to prevent his further interference. The Lord Chief Justice directed the jury that the plaintiff was not trespassing. Under that ruling they found that a nominal sum of five shillings paid into court was sufficient damages for the assault upon him. Counsel then said that, after his Lordship's ruling, he could hardly press the counterclaim, which asserted that the act of the plaintiff was a trespass, and sought for an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from repeating it.

This counterclaim is in fact a cross-action seeking equitable relief, which may now be brought in the Queen's Bench Division: see Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24 (3) [see now Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 36]. Where a trespass is committed in assertion of a fancied right, and it is shown that it will be repeated unless prevented, the Court of Chancery has constantly granted injunctions to prevent a repetition of the trespass. Upon this point there is now before us a cross-appeal by the defendants. They ask for an injunction; but, upon being pressed by me, counsel said he would not insist upon the injunction, but desired the decision of this court by declaration whether or not the act of the plaintiff was a misuse of the soil of the highway which amounted to a trespass. It is not unusual in the Chancery Division to make such a declaration without going on to grant an injunction. It clearly may be done under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 5.

Whatever may be thought of the so-called sport of standing in a butt and shooting at grouse driven over, it is not prohibited by law; and, subject to the provisions of the statute to which I have referred for the protection of wayfarers upon the high road, it is a not unlawful exercise of the right of the owner of the land. The plaintiff went upon this highway, not for the purpose of exercising as one of the public his right of passage, but of interfering with the grouse drive by placing himself upon the soil of the highway so as to prevent the grouse from flying over the butts. In his own language, taken from his evidence, he says: "I certainly meant to take up my position in front of the butts." "I went there to defend the public right." With great deference, I am unable to agree that this was a use of the right of passing along the highway. I think it was an abuse of that right. In other words, it was a use of the soil of the highway for another purpose, which use interfered, and was intended to interfere, with a right which was then being exercised by the owner of the soil, and was incident to that ownership. Such a misuse of the soil of a highway is a trespass. There seems to have been sufficient evidence that the plaintiff was not only asserting a right to do what he did, but also that his intention was to repeat his interference. This strictly would entitle the defendants to the assistance of the court by injunction to prevent a repetition of the act. But this is not pressed for; and I think that the defendants are entitled at any rate to a declaration under Ord. 25, r. 5, upon their counterclaim, that under the circumstances the plaintiff, upon Oct. 8, 1890, when stopped by the duke's keepers, was trespassing upon the soil of the highway. I am not so much impressed with the consequences of granting an injunction. The court exercises the power of enforcing such an order by an imprisonment with very great care and caution. The damages given to the plaintiff for the alleged assault upon him by the keepers on the assumption that he was not a trespasser were only five shillings. They would not be more on the ruling that he was a trespasser, and the defendants do not ask to alter the amount. The plaintiff's appeal fails, and must be dismissed. The defendants' appeal succeeds. The plaintiff's claim is dismissed with costs. The defendants' counterclaim is allowed with costs.

BARNARDO v. FORD. GOSSAGE'S CASE

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Herschell, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris and Lord Hannen), April 24, 1891, April 4, 5, May 6, July 25, 1892]

[Reported [1892] A.C. 326; 61 L.J.Q.B. 728; 67 L.T. 1; 56 J.P. 629; 41 W.R. 333; 8 T.L.R. 728; 36 Sol. Jo. 681; 1 R. 17]

Habeas Corpus—Return to writ—Cessation of illegal detention before application for writ—Opposition to application—Issue of writ to decide on return matters raised in opposition.

Where an application for a writ of habeas corpus comes before the court and the court is satisfied that the illegal detention alleged ceased before the application for the writ was made or the person to whom it was directed had notice of the application, so that at those times the person to whom the writ relates was no longer in the custody, power, or control of the respondent to the writ, that is a good return to the writ, which, therefore, should not be ordered to issue. The remedy of habeas corpus is intended to facilitate the release of persons detained in unlawful custody and not to afford the means of inflicting penalties on those persons by whom they were at some time or other illegally detained. If, how-

A ever, the court entertains a doubt whether it be a fact that at the material time the person alleged to be detained was not in the control of the respondent to the writ, the court may issue the writ, and the matter can be decided on the return to the writ when the respondent can be cross-examined.

B Per LORD HERSCHELL: Appeals against the issue of writs of habeas corpus should not be encouraged. When a tribunal believes that a person is or may be under detention in unlawful custody and issues a writ of habeas corpus accordingly, no court of appeal ought lightly to interfere with the issue of the writ.

R. v. Barnardo (1) (1889), 23 Q.B.D. 305, disapproved.

Contempt of Court—Habeas corpus—Custody of person detained given up from apprehension of issue of writ.

C Per LORD WATSON: In my opinion, no contempt is committed by a person who, lawfully or unlawfully, absolutely gives up the custody of a child [and, semble, any other person detained] from the mere apprehension that, by retaining that person, he may become liable to a writ of habeas corpus, and without any notice that such a proceeding will be taken.

Barnardo, Gossage's Case*, affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and BOWEN, L.J.) making absolute a rule nisi for a writ of habeas corpus.

H The appellant was the founder and director of institutions in the East End of London and elsewhere, known as Dr. Barnardo's Homes for Destitute Children. The respondent, Mary Ford, was the wife of John W. Ford, of Wolverhampton, a labourer, and the mother of Harry Gossage by her former husband, Edward Gossage, who died in November, 1882, intestate, and without having appointed any guardian for his infant children. The child Harry Gossage was born in J January, 1880, and was baptised in 1883 in a Roman Catholic church at Southam, in Warwickshire. It appeared that the mother, in the autumn of 1888, being in destitute circumstances, accepted the offer of an organ-grinder at Leamington, whom she had known for some time and whose character she believed to be good, to take the child for a time, and further exacted a promise from him that he would communicate with her should he at any time wish to part with the boy. According to Dr. Barnardo's statement, he received, in September, 1888, a letter from a clergyman at Folkestone, saying that a policeman had found a little boy there who said he had no home, and that he had come to Folkestone with two organ-grinders, who had treated him badly and turned him off. The writer having expressed a wish that Dr. Barnardo should receive the boy, he was shortly afterwards admitted to one of the homes. The mother was communicated with, and wrote a letter to Dr. Barnardo, saying she was pleased that he was going to take care of her son, as she could not keep him herself, and added that his two brothers had already been sent to Canada. Shortly afterwards a Mr. Norton, from Quebec, offered to adopt a boy from the homes, and Dr. Barnardo, after making inquiries about this gentleman, accepted his offer, and the boy he selected from several whom Dr. Barnardo put forward was Harry Gossage. On Nov. 16 the boy was handed over to Mr. Norton. According to Dr. Barnardo this was done solely for the welfare and benefit of the boy, and not, as alleged by the respondent, in order to get him out of his custody so that the boy's relations should be unable to interfere and have him placed in a home where he would be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. The appellant admitted that he received a letter posted on Nov. 11, written at the request of the mother by Mr. Alfred Newdigate, a Roman Catholic gentleman, asking that the boy might be given up to him. Since Dr. Barnardo handed over the boy to Mr. Norton, he said that he had never heard from the boy or from Mr. Norton, and, further, that he did not know where either of them were, nor their address, nor had he any means of communicating with either of them. The respondent applied for a rule nisi for a writ of habeas corpus, which was made absolute by the Queen's Bench Division, a decision which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. From that decision Dr. Barnardo appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., Cock, Q.C., and W. Baker for the appellant.
Sir Walter Phillimore, J. Walton and Lankester for the respondent.

A preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the respondent that no appeal lay from an order that a writ of habeas corpus should issue. The opinions of their Lordships on this matter will now be omitted from this report in view of the provisions of s. 15 (1) of the Administration of Justice Act, 1960, that "an appeal shall lie, in any proceedings upon application for habeas corpus... against an order for the release of the person restrained as well as against the refusal of such an order."

July 25, 1892. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—As there is to be a return, and more evidence may be adduced to show what is the real state of the facts, I designedly abstain from saying anything which may preclude me from forming a perfectly unbiased judgment when all the facts have been finally ascertained. But it is of importance, I think, to say, since it may tend to shorten the inquiry which the respondents suggest that they propose to make, that I cannot acquiesce in the view that some of the learned judges below seem to have entertained, that, if a court is satisfied that illegal detention has ceased before application for the writ has been made, nevertheless the writ might issue in order to vindicate the authority of the court against a person who has once, though not at the time of the issue of the writ, unlawfully detained another or wrongfully parted with the custody. This is a view that I cannot agree to. I think, under such circumstances, the writ ought not to issue at all, as it is not the appropriate procedure for punishing such conduct. Of course where a counterfeited release has taken place, and a pretended ignorance of the place of custody or of the identity of the custodian is insisted on, a court may, and ought to, examine into the facts by the writ of habeas corpus, because the detention is, in fact, being continued by someone who is really the agent of the original wrongdoer to continue and persist in the unlawful detention. But, assuming that the detention has ceased, then the writ of habeas corpus is, in my judgment, inapplicable. For the reasons I have given I say nothing about the facts in this case, but, treating the facts as still open to inquiry, I think this appeal

A should be dismissed upon the ground that the respondent has a right to the return, and I so move your Lordships.

LORD HERSCHELL dealt with the preliminary objection, stated the facts, and continued: On Mar. 1, 1889, the appellant was served with a summons to attend a judge of the Queen's Bench Division to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus, commanding him to produce the body of Harry Gossage, should not be issued. Several affidavits were filed before the summons came on for hearing. In one filed by Dr. Barnardo he stated that before he received any application from the mother for the return of the child, he, on Nov. 16, 1888, transferred him to the care of a Mr. William Norton, an American gentleman, who was at that time on a visit to this country, and that he believed that the boy was taken by Mr. Norton to Canada a few days later. He further deposed that he had not, since he handed over the boy, heard either from him or from Mr. Norton, that he did not know where he or Mr. Norton were, and that he had no means of communicating with either of them. He further stated that before handing over the boy he satisfied himself that Mr. Norton was a fit and proper person to have the custody of the child. In an affidavit sworn a few days subsequently he deposed that Harry Gossage was not then, and since Nov. 16, 1888, when he transferred him to the care of Mr. Norton, had not been, in his custody or power. The summons came on for hearing before MATHEW, J., on Mar. 14, 1889, when the learned judge, having read the affidavits filed, and heard the cross-examination of the appellant, refused to order the writ to issue.

No further steps were taken till Nov. 23, 1889, when a rule nisi was granted for a writ of habeas corpus by the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench. In the meantime R. v. Barnardo (1) had been decided in the Court of Appeal. This was a decision affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division quashing a return to a habeas corpus and granting an attachment against the defendant for contempt. It was in consequence of the judgments given in the Court of Appeal, which laid down that it was not an excuse for non-compliance with a writ that the defendant had parted with the custody of the child to another person, if he had done so wrongfully, that the application was again made for a writ of habeas corpus in the present case. In addition to the affidavits used on the former application further affidavits were filed. I do not think it necessary, for reasons which I will state presently, to enter upon an examination of any of the affidavits. It will be sufficient to state that Dr. Barnardo deposed that it was on Nov. 10, 1888, that he first made the acquaintance of Mr. Norton, into whose custody he delivered the boy, and Mr. Norton showed him letters of introduction from well-known people in Canada, and stated that his object was to discover if Dr. Barnardo could place a little boy under his care, that he was anxious to find a boy who would not be interfered with by his relations, as he wished, if he liked the boy, to adopt him as his son. Dr. Barnardo accordingly brought five of the boys in his home to see Mr. Norton, among whom was Harry Gossage. After talking with him for some time Mr. Norton asked to be allowed to adopt him. Dr. Barnardo accordingly arranged that he should be ready on Nov. 16, and on that day, when Mr. Norton again came to the home, he took the boy away with him. According to Dr. Barnardo's statement, Mr. Norton expressed himself as very anxious that there should not be any interference on the part of the child's relatives, and his affidavits stated that he did not know where Mr. Norton or the boy then were, nor did he know their or either of their addresses, and that he had no means of communicating with them or either of them. After hearing argument, the Queen's Bench Division made absolute the order for the issue of the writ, and this order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

If in order to support this judgment it were necessary to give my adhesion to the law laid down in R. v. Barnardo (1), I should hesitate much before doing so. Having regard to the nature of a writ of habeas corpus and the purpose for which it was designed and has hitherto been employed, I cannot feel satisfied, as at present advised, that it is not a good return to the writ that the person to whom it relates was not at the time it was issued in the custody, power, or control of the person upon whom it is served. The doctrine that he must also show that before the writ was issued or before he had notice of the application for its issue he had not wrongfully parted with the custody of the person named in the writ is novel, and appears to me to involve great difficulty. A gaoler who has allowed a prisoner to escape has wrongfully parted with the custody of that person; could he be commanded by a writ of habeas corpus issued after the escape to produce him and be committed for contempt of court if he failed to do so? Other illustrations might be given to show the difficulty of assenting to the broad proposition laid down in the Court of Appeal. A

The question is not whether one who has parted with the custody of a person committed to his care can be made amenable to the law if he wrongfully parts with that custody, but whether the writ of habeas corpus is the appropriate remedy. The terms of the writ require the recipient to have the body of the person named in it B

"taken and detained under your custody, as is said, together with the day and cause of his being detained, to undergo and receive all and singular such matters and things as the said court shall then and there consider of concerning him in this behalf." D

This indicates that the very basis of the writ is the allegation, and the prima facie evidence in support of it, that the person to whom the writ is directed is unlawfully detaining another in custody. To use it as a means of compelling one who has unlawfully parted with the custody of another person to regain that custody, or of punishing him for having parted with it, strikes me at present as being a use of the writ unknown to the law and not warranted by it. E

But the question remains whether, even assuming that the decision in R. v. Barnardo (1) was not well founded, the appellant is entitled to have the order that the writ should issue discharged. I have already given my reasons for thinking that this House cannot reject, as incompetent, an appeal against an order for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus, but I feel most strongly that such appeals are not to be encouraged. Where any tribunal believes that a person is or may be under detention in unlawful custody, and issues a writ of habeas corpus accordingly, no court of appeal ought lightly to interfere with the issue of the writ. The order for its issue ought only to be set aside if there be, beyond question, no ground for it. If, for example, in the present case it had been an admitted fact that before notice of the application for the writ the appellant had ceased to have the custody of or any control over the boy alleged to be detained, that might have been ground for reversing the order of the Queen's Bench Division. But where the court entertains a doubt whether this be the fact, it is unquestionably entitled to use the pressure of the writ to test the truth of the allegation and to require a return to be made to it. It is impossible to read the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice without seeing that he did entertain such a doubt, and that he was not prepared, upon the affidavits, to accept as conclusive the statements of the appellant. At your Lordships' Bar the counsel for the respondent contended that they had a right to cross-examine the appellant, and that the proper occasion on which to try the question was when he had returned to the writ that he was not detaining the child, and that it was not at the time the writ was issued in his custody, power, or control. I think this view is the correct one; the truth of the return may, no doubt, be put in issue, and I feel myself unable to advise your Lordships that the Queen's Bench Division were not, in point of law, justified in issuing the writ. F G H I

I must not be understood as indicating that I think the story told by the appellant is untrue. But, as the matter is to undergo further investigation, it would obviously be improper to enter upon any discussion of the statements contained in the affidavits, or to express any opinion upon them. I come to this conclusion with some regret, as the question intended to be raised by this appeal is one of no

A small importance. But, in my opinion, it was premature to raise it at the present stage, and I think it very important not to set a precedent which might prove prejudicial to the liberty of the subject, of which the writ of habeas corpus is the most effectual safeguard. For these reasons I think the judgment appealed from must be affirmed.

B LORD WATSON.—I concur in the motion which has been proposed by the Lord Chancellor. Seeing that the writ must go, and that the appellant will have the opportunity of making further explanations, I refrain from comment upon the facts already in evidence; but I wish to make it clear that my reasons for agreeing with the judgment moved are not quite the same with those by which some of the learned judges in the court below were influenced.

C The remedy of habeas corpus is, in my opinion, intended actually to facilitate the release of persons detained in unlawful custody, and was not meant to afford the means of inflicting penalties upon those persons by whom they were at some time or other illegally detained. Accordingly, the writ invariably sets forth that the individual whose release is sought, whether adult or infant, is taken and detained in the custody of the person to whom it is addressed; and rightly so, because it is the fact of detention, and nothing else, which gives the court jurisdiction. I find that, in R. v. Barnardo (1), LINDLEY, L.J., said (23 Q.B.D. at pp. 315, 316):

E “As a matter of law I think that it is no valid excuse for not producing a child or other person in obedience to a writ of habeas corpus to state inability to obey, if such inability is the result of the previous illegal conduct of the person to whom the writ is addressed. . . . Persons who illegally put a child out of their power do so at their peril, and, if they are ordered to produce the child, no excuse founded on their own inability to comply with the order will be held a sufficient answer to the writ.”

The circumstances of that case were not altogether the same with those with which your Lordships have to deal. LORD ESHER, M.R., does not appear to have differed in opinion from LINDLEY, L.J., while COTTON, L.J., seems to have treated the case as one of contempt in parting with the custody of the child. In the present case LORD ESHER, M.R., has adopted and repeated, in forcible language, the view expressed by LINDLEY, L.J., in R. v. Barnardo (1), although his Lordship's observations are mainly directed to the case of a child.

F I venture to doubt whether the law laid down by LINDLEY, L.J., in these broad terms is sound. If it be so, then the writ may be used as a convenient process for punishing a gaoler who has connived at the escape of one of the prisoners under his charge. I see no difference in principle between the case of a gaoler so misconducting himself and the case of a man who unlawfully parts with the custody of an infant. To order the latter to recover the custody of the child and to place its person at the disposal of the court may and probably will necessitate the employment by him of agents and detectives, and application for the assistance of foreign courts, which, in my opinion, are neither more nor less than penalties imposed in respect of his breach of duty. I do not for a moment suggest that there is not a legal wrong committed in both cases, but that wrong is the very reverse of illegal detention, for which alone the writ of habeas corpus was meant to give a remedy. If there be no other remedy in such cases, I am satisfied that it is for the legislature, and not for any court, either of law or equity, to provide one; and I cannot see the propriety of the court applying to these cases a remedy which was enacted for a totally different purpose.

I It is, in my opinion, a grave objection to the use of habeas corpus for punitive purposes that the prosecutor would have the unusual privilege of hunting the offender from court to court until he found a tribunal willing to convict. Although that privilege has with much propriety been conceded in all cases where there is actual detention, I can hardly conceive that the legislature would tolerate it in cases where detention has ceased. Where it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the person charged with unlawfully detaining a child or adult had de facto ceased to have any custody or control, I am of opinion that the writ ought not to issue. A man who parts with the custody of a child after he is served with the process of the court, or who evades service in order that he may get rid of such custody, commits a plain contempt, for which he is answerable to the court. Even in that case I doubt whether it is competent, and I do not doubt that it is inexpedient, to enforce the writ de plano. The case ought to be dealt with, in such circumstances, as one of contempt; and the court has power to pronounce an order which will compel the quondam custodian to choose between placing himself in a position which will make him liable to the writ or to bear the consequences of his contumacy. I think it right to add that, in my opinion, no contempt is committed by a person who, lawfully or unlawfully, absolutely gives up the custody and control of a child from the mere apprehension that, by retaining it, he may become liable to a writ of habeas corpus, and without any notice that such a proceeding will be taken. In March, 1888, eight months before this proceeding commenced, a similar application was made to MATHEW, J., who, after hearing the cross-examination of the appellant by counsel on behalf of the respondent, came to the conclusion that he had ceased to have the custody or control of the boy, Henry Gossage, in November, 1887. In these circumstances the learned judge, taking what I conceive to be the right view of the law, refused to issue the writ. Four months afterwards the decision of the Court of Appeal was given in R. v. Barnardo (1); and it is difficult to resist the impression that the present proceedings were brought in order to get the benefit of the novel doctrine laid down in that case, which had found no favour with MATHEW, J. Had there been no other reason for sustaining it, I should not have hesitated to reverse the judgment appealed from. But I willingly defer to those of your Lordships who are of opinion that the case may be more conveniently disposed of after a return has been made to the writ, although I am not inclined to prolong litigation of this kind, which is little calculated to advance the interests of institutions engaged in the useful work of reclaiming children from the streets. When a waif has been taken up and cared for by one of them, he apparently becomes an object of interest and competition, and funds are wasted in litigation which would be better employed in the rescue of children who are still uncared for.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I do not dissent from the motion which has been proposed. I cannot say that this is a case in which there ought not to be an opportunity of further inquiring into the circumstances under which Dr. Barnardo parted with the child, and ascertaining beyond all doubt whether the child is or is not still under Dr. Barnardo's control or within his reach. In a matter of this sort it would not, I think, be desirable to interfere with the discretion of the court below unless a stronger case for interference were made out than the one which the learned counsel for the appellant have been able to produce. Whether the child, if it can be got back, ought to be handed over to the mother, or dealt with in accordance with her directions or directions given in her name, is another question, upon which it would not be proper to intimate an opinion at present. Whether or not Dr. Barnardo has rendered himself liable to an attachment may be a matter to be discussed hereafter. That question ought, I think, to be left wholly unprejudiced by any comment upon facts or circumstances which have not as yet been thoroughly sifted or tested by cross-examination. I desire, however, to state my concurrence with the opinion expressed by FRY, L.J., I entirely agree with him in thinking that the writ of habeas corpus ought not to be wrested from its proper purpose and used as an instrument to punish a man for an illegal or unauthorised act complete before the jurisdiction of the court can be supposed to have attached. I will only add that it is very much to be regretted that the managers of a charitable institution which has done, and is I have no doubt doing, an immense deal of good, should have tried to put off a troublesome correspondent by letters which, to say the least, were uncandid and misleading.

A LORD MORRIS.—I concur in the judgment which has been moved, but I desire to say that in doing so I adopt the reasons assigned and the views given of the law both in the Queen's Bench Division and in the Court of Appeal as the foundation of my concurrence in the judgment.

B LORD HANNEN.—I entirely concur in the conclusions at which your Lordships have arrived, and I have only to add that the opinion expressed by Lord HERSCHELL so exactly represents the view which I take of the case that I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord.

Divorce—Decree absolute—Decree nisi on wife's petition not made absolute—Wife going through ceremony of marriage with another man—Later resumption of cohabitation with husband—Renewed cruelty—Revival of previous offences.

F

In 1884 the wife was granted a decree nisi on the grounds of her husband's adultery and cruelty, but no steps were taken to make the decree absolute. In May, 1885, the wife, believing that the marriage was dissolved six months after the decree nisi, went through a form of marriage with a man with whom she lived, and by whom she had two children, until he died in June, 1889. In January, 1890, she resumed cohabitation with the husband who told her that she was not divorced from him, but, owing to his cruelty towards her, she left him in November, 1891. On an application by the wife to make the decree nisi of 1884 absolute, the Queen's Proctor intervening,

G

Held: while the wife's resumption of cohabitation with her husband condoned his previous marital offences, that condonation was only conditional and his subsequent cruelty revived the previous offences; in those circumstances and the other circumstances of the case, the petitioner should not be debarred from obtaining a decree absolute.

Application to make a decree nisi absolute on an intervention of the Queen's Proctor.

The petitioner, Ernestine Catherine Moore, was born of German parents in England, and married the respondent in 1874. In July, 1883, she filed a petition, praying for a divorce on the grounds of her husband's adultery and cruelty, and for the custody of the children of the marriage. On June 24, 1884, a decree nisi was granted. That decree had never been made absolute. The petitioner's reasons for this, as detailed in evidence, were that she knew that she had to allow six months to elapse from the date of the decree nisi, but that she did not know of any decree absolute being required, and she did not trouble any more about the divorce, and did not leave her address with her solicitors. She was moving about a good deal at that time, and she did not remember receiving from her solicitors a letter dated Jan. 22, 1885, and addressed to her in reference to the divorce. Alimony stopped as soon as the decree nisi was obtained. She never received or read any copy of that decree. In May, 1885, she married James Brown, with whom she lived till his death, in June, 1889, and by whom she had two children. She described herself in the marriage certificate as a "spinster," because she had been told that a divorced woman should describe herself as "single."

In January, 1890, the respondent husband returned, and told her that she had been living in adultery with Brown, because she had not got her decree nisi made absolute before she married him. Until then she had only seen the husband on one occasion since the decree nisi, and had never heard about any decree absolute before January, 1890. She was, at that time, carrying on a small business, and had got a home together for herself and the children. The husband wanted to come and live with her again. She told him that it would first be necessary for them to be married again. He said that was not so, as she was not divorced. He said that it would be better for the children that he and she should live together again, and he promised, if she would consent to take him back, that he would be different in his behaviour towards her. She consented, and some of her friends found him a situation, but he gave her none of his wages, and he soon lost his place, and took to drinking again. She was obliged to give up the business, and removed to 58, King's Road, Camden Town, and let apartments to earn a little money. In October, 1891, the husband came home intoxicated, and knocked her down. She fell against the kitchen fender. He struck her, and she became insensible. When she returned to consciousness, she found the top of one of her fingers nearly off. She tried to rise, and he then struck her three times. On Nov. 10, 1891, the husband committed another violent assault on her, and she was in bed for four days. He said he would "do twelve months" for her. In consequence of his violence, she left him altogether about the middle of November, 1891, and had never lived with him since. She went to her mother's. Some of the children went there, and others to friends of hers. She had been earning her living since then. After finally leaving the husband, the wife went to consult her present solicitor, and, by his advice, she volunteered to the Queen's Proctor a full statement of all the facts. The Queen's Proctor thereupon intervened. The cruelty in October and November, 1891, was corroborated by three witnesses, and GORELL BARNES, J., said that he was fully satisfied as to that part of the case.

Bromby for the wife.

GORELL BARNES.—Dent v. Dent (1) appears to me to be precisely in point on the question of revival of a matrimonial offence, and I do not see that the observations of LORD BLACKBURN in Collins v. Collins (2) overrule that decision.

- A [His LORDSHIP stated the facts.] Having regard to the circumstances and the way in which the petitioner gave her evidence, and also having regard to the fact that from her German origin she may not have been fully alive to the necessary details of procedure, I think she honestly believed—and the Queen's Proctor also seems to have come to that conclusion—that she was legally right in going through the ceremony of marriage with another person. According to the decision in
- B Noble v. Noble and Godman (3), if the court is satisfied that the petitioner, in going through the form of a second marriage, honestly believed that she was entitled to do so by reason of the decree nisi, she ought not to be debarred from obtaining her decree absolute.

- A further point arises on this case, which is one of some novelty, and has not been the subject of any previous decision. It arises thus. In June, 1889, the man
- C Brown died, and the petitioner some time in the following year seems to have met the respondent, who informed her of her position in consequence of the decree nisi not having been made absolute, and invited her to resume cohabitation. She apparently thought it was for the interests of her children that she should renew cohabitation, and she continued to live with him until he treated her with great cruelty. No doubt that cohabitation was in itself a condonation of the former
- D marital offences; but I cannot see why the fact that the petitioner went through a form of marriage with another person should debar her from the benefit of the ruling in Dent v. Dent (1), that condonation is only conditional, and that a matrimonial offence committed after condonation revives the offences committed before it. It follows, therefore, that the subsequent cruelty of her husband places the petitioner in the position which she occupied when she obtained a decree nisi, and entitles
- E her to have that decree made absolute. I, therefore, dismiss the Queen's Proctor's intervention, and the decree will be made absolute on the usual affidavits.

Insurance—Marine insurance—Proximate cause of loss—Insurance against collision with any object—Collision with snag in river—Temporary repair of damage—Renewed leaking leading to loss of vessel.

- A ship was insured against damage received in collision with any object, but not against perils of the sea. During the currency of the policy, the ship
- I ran against a floating snag in a river, the collision, among other things, breaking the cover of a condenser and leaving an opening. Temporary repairs in the form of plugs in the ejection pipes running from the condenser were effected, and a tug was sent to tow the ship to a place where she could be thoroughly repaired. While she was being towed, one of the plugs came out, the ship began to leak, and she was run aground and abandoned.

Held: the collision was the proximate cause of the loss, since the damage resulting from it remained throughout, and, accordingly, the loss of the ship was covered by the policy.

Appeal by the defendants from an order of KENNEDY, J.,

The plaintiff was the owner of the steam tug Rosa, which was insured by the defendants. The risks insured against in the policy were "the risk of collision (as per clause attached) and damage received in collision with any object, including ice," while in the Danube or its tributaries. The clause attached related to collision with other vessels, and the policy did not include perils of the sea. During the currency of the policy, on Mar. 4, 1892, while the Rosa was engaged on a trip in the Danube, she ran against a floating snag, which first struck the bottom of the ship and then fouled the port paddle-wheel and damaged the vessel. That damage included serious injury to the engine-room machinery, and amongst other things the breaking of the cover of the condenser, which left an opening some twenty square inches in area. In consequence of the damage received, the vessel commenced leaking and there was imminent danger of the entrance of water through the ejection pipes and the connection therefrom into the ship through the broken condenser cover. As speedily as possible those pipes were plugged from the outside. The captain immediately sent for assistance to the owner, and assistance came in the shape of a tug called the Olga, which arrived on Mar. 6, and on that night commenced to tow the vessel to a place where she could be repaired and the damage made good. On the morning of Mar. 7, while she was being towed by the Olga, a large quantity of water poured into the engine-room through the hole in the condenser cover, and caused the vessel to fill rapidly. The inrush of water was caused by the plug which had been placed in the ejection pipe on the port side of the Rosa having suddenly fallen out. The towing was stopped, and an attempt was made to stop up the aperture in the ejection pipe, but without success. In order to prevent the Rosa from sinking in deep water, as otherwise she would have done, the Olga towed her towards the southern bank of the river, but, while this was being done, the Olga suddenly took the ground, and the Rosa became stranded and partly submerged, and was abandoned.

The plaintiff claimed damages for the total loss of the vessel. The defendants paid into court a sum sufficient to satisfy their liability, if any, for the damage sustained by the collision with the snag up to the time when the vessel was taken in tow by the Olga, but with a denial of liability. With respect to the subsequent

A damage, they contended that they were under no liability, on the ground that the proximate cause of that damage was not the collision, but the towing to a port of repair. KENNEDY, J., overruled this contention, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed.

July 2, 1894. LINDLEY, L.J.—There is no doubt that, in considering the liabilities of underwriters of marine insurance policies, it is a cardinal rule to regard “proximate” and not “remote” causes of loss. This rule is based on the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract into which they have entered; but the rule must be applied with good sense, so as to give effect to, and not to defeat, those intentions. The risks insured against in this policy are:

D The “risk of collision as per clause attached” refers to collisions with other ships, and may be disregarded. The other risk refers to, and includes, such a collision as took place in the present case, viz., a collision between the ship insured and a snag in the river which she was navigating. She was injured by a peril insured against, and liability to make good that injury has arisen, and is not denied. The extent of that liability is the matter in dispute. Is the liability confined to repairing the injured parts? If not, does the liability extend to making good all loss or damage which is, in fact, attributable to the injury occasioned by the collision?

E The liability of the underwriters cannot, I think, be restricted to repairing the injured parts, and, indeed, counsel for the defendants did not seriously contend that it could. If the ship had sunk, and been lost under such circumstances as to render the inference unavoidable that the collision caused the loss, it is plain that the cost of repairing the damage would not be the measure of the liability of the underwriters. The moment, however, that this conclusion is arrived at, it is difficult to see on what principle liability for a loss occasioned by that injury can be excluded, except on the ordinary principles applicable to remoteness of damage. The fact that some fresh cause arises, without which the injury would not have led to further loss, is, I think, in such a case far from conclusive. Assume that this ship would have floated in calm water notwithstanding the injury she had sustained by the collision, and suppose that, before such injury could be made good, the water became so rough as to get into her and sink her, by reason only of her injured condition, such loss would, in my opinion, be proximately, though not exclusively, caused by the collision, and would fall on the underwriters of a policy worded as this policy is. It may be that such a loss would also be covered by a policy against perils of the sea in the ordinary form; but this does not, in my opinion, show that

H no liability attaches under a policy such as the present.

I Policies may be so worded as to overlap and cover some risk common to them all. The sinking of this ship was proximately caused by the internal injuries produced by the collision, and by water reaching and getting through the injured parts while she was being towed to a place of repair. The sinking was due as much to one of these causes as to the other; each was as much a “proximate” cause of her sinking as the other, and it would, in my opinion, be contrary to good sense to hold that the damage by the sinking was not covered by this policy. Negligence or mismanagement on the part of those on board the ship is not suggested. To stop up the ejection pipes was right and proper, and, although one of them became unstopped and water reached the injured parts through this unstopped pipe, this was not the result of negligence. All was done that could be done to save the ship and get her out of harm’s way, and she sank because, notwithstanding all efforts to keep water out of her, water got into her through the hole in her condenser cover which had been caused by the collision.

I feel the difficulty of expressing in precise language the distinction between causes which co-operate in producing a given result. When they succeed each other at intervals which can be observed, it is comparatively easy to distinguish them and to trace their respective effects, but under other circumstances it may be impossible to do so. It appears to me, however, that an injury to a ship may fairly be said to cause its loss if, before that injury is or can be repaired, the ship is lost by reason of the existence of that injury—i.e., under circumstances which, but for the injury, would not have affected her safety. It follows that if, as in this case, a policy is effected covering such an injury, it will in the circumstances supposed extend to the loss of the ship, for in the case supposed the injury will really be the cause of that loss—the causa causans and not merely the causa sine qua non. I am not aware of any authority opposed to this view. It is consistent with the judgment in Pink v. Fleming (1), which is more favourable to the defendants than any other authority cited or known to me. In my opinion, the judgment appealed from is correct, and this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—This is a policy indemnifying the insurers against “the risk of collision” (by which I understand collision with other ships) “and damage received in collision with any object, including ice.” The question is, under the circumstances of this case, was the damage “received in collision” with a snag in the river Danube? It is admitted that damages for the injury sustained by the condenser are recoverable, but it is contended that what subsequently happened was not attributable to the collision as a proximate cause, but to some intervening and independent cause. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued:] In cases of marine insurance, it is well-settled law that it is only the proximate cause that is to be regarded and all others rejected, although the loss would not have happened without them. Damage received in collision must, therefore, in this case be the proximate cause of the loss to entitle the plaintiff to recover. The damage received in the collision was the breaking of the condenser, and it was the broken condenser which really caused the proximate loss. The tug was continuously in danger from the time the condenser was broken, and the broken condenser never ceased to be an imminent element of danger, though that danger was mitigated for a time by the insertion of the plug in the outside of this vessel. The cause of the damage to the condenser was the collision, and the consequences of the collision (that is, the broken condenser) never ceased to exist, but constantly remained the efficient and predominating peril to which the damage now sought to be recovered was attributable.

It was contended that the towing the tug through the water after the collision was the proximate cause of the loss now sought to be recovered. It was, however, admitted that this was a reasonable and proper act in the circumstances. This may have been a concurrent cause, and one without which the loss would not have happened, but, in my judgment, it is not, but the broken condenser is, the proximate cause. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

DAYEY, L.J.—In this case, the defendants admit that damage done by water coming through a hole caused by a collision with any object is damage against which the assurers are bound to indemnify the assured. What is the causa proxima of the damage caused in this case? The only answer seems to me to be the inroad of the water through the hole in the condenser. What made the hole in the condenser? The collision made the hole in the condenser, and the broken condenser was a continuing source of risk and danger. The failure of the attempt to mitigate or stop the damage arising from the breach in the condenser cannot, in my opinion, be justly described as the cause of the ultimate damage. I, therefore, agree in the judgments which have been given.

By s. 9 of the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, a person who utters counterfeit coin is guilty of a misdemeanour, and, being convicted thereof, is liable to imprisonment. By s. 12, a person who has been convicted of a misdemeanour under s. 9 and who subsequently commits a misdemeanour under that section is guilty of a felony. By s. 37, a certificate stating the substance and effect only of the indictment, charging and conviction of the previous offence is sufficient evidence of that previous conviction. The prisoner was indicted for felony under s. 12, and a certificate of previous conviction under s. 9 was produced which showed that she had been released on finding one surety for her appearance to hear judgment when called on.

Held: the word "convicted" in s. 9 and s. 12 meant only "having been found guilty" and must not be taken to include judgment or sentence; accordingly, the prisoner was liable to conviction under s. 12.

Case Stated by the Common Serjeant of London.

This prisoner was tried at the Central Criminal Court for feloniously uttering counterfeit coin under s. 12 of the Coinage Offences Act, 1861. The prisoner was given in charge to the jury on the first part of the indictment only, viz., that which charged her with uttering a counterfeit florin, on Jan. 11, 1894, to Emily Hutchinson, well knowing it to be false and counterfeit. She pleaded guilty. The prisoner was then given in charge to the jury on the second part of the indictment, which charged her with having been previously convicted on April 23, 1888, in the name of Ellen Edwards, of unlawfully uttering a counterfeit half-crown to Ellen Dann, knowing the same to be false and counterfeit. To this charge, she pleaded Not Guilty. A police officer was called who stated that he had been present in court when the prisoner was convicted on April 23, 1888, and produced a certificate of her conviction which read as follows :

“Central Criminal Court to wit. These are to certify that at the general session of the delivery of the Queen’s Gaol of Newgate, and other prisons holden for the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, at Justice Hall, in the Old Bailey, in the suburbs of the City of London, on Monday, the 23rd day of April, in the year of our Lord 1888, before certain justices of our said Lady the Queen, assigned to deliver the said gaols of the prisoners therein being, Ellen Edwards was in due form of law convicted on a certain indictment against her for that she did unlawfully utter a counterfeit half-crown to Ellen Dann, knowing the same to be false and counterfeit, against the statute, etc., and against the peace, etc., and the said Ellen Edwards was thereupon ordered to find one surety in the sum of twenty pounds for her appearance to hear judgment when called upon.—Dated the 30th day of January, 1894.—H. K. AVORY, Clerk of the said court.”

Counsel for the prisoner submitted there was no case to go to the jury, because in order to constitute a conviction there must be both verdict and judgment; here there was no judgment, only an order, empowering the prisoner to be released on entering into a recognisance to come up for judgment. The Common Sergeant overruled the submission, and the jury found that the prisoner was the person named in the certificate. The question for the court was whether the prisoner could properly be convicted of felony.

The Coinage Offences Act, 1861, provides :

“Whosoever shall tender, utter, or put off any false or counterfeit coin resembling, or apparently intended to resemble, or pass for any of the Queen’s current gold or silver coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall . . . be guilty of a misdemeanour.”

“12. Whosoever, having been convicted either before or after the passing of this Act, of any such misdemeanour, or crime and offence, as in any of the last three preceding sections mentioned, or of any felony or high crime and offence against this or any former Act relating to the coin, shall afterwards commit any of the misdemeanours or crimes and offences in any of the said sections mentioned, shall . . . be guilty of felony.”

“37. Where any person shall have been convicted of any offence against this Act . . . and shall afterwards be indicted for any offence against this Act committed subsequent to such conviction, it shall be sufficient in any such indictment, after charging such subsequent offence, to state the substance and effect only (omitting the formal part) of the indictment and conviction for the previous offence; and a certificate containing the substance and effect only (omitting the formal part) of the indictment and conviction for the previous offence, purporting to be signed by the clerk of the court or other officer having or purporting to have the custody of the records of the court where the offender was first committed, or by the deputy of such clerk or officer, shall, upon proof of the identity of the person of the offender, be sufficient evidence of the previous conviction, without proof of the signature or official character or authority of the person appearing to have signed the same, or of his custody or right to the custody of the records of the court.”

Burnie for the prisoner.

Sutton and Partridge for the Crown.

- A HAWKINS, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—I have no difficulty in expressing my opinion that this conviction should be affirmed, and on the very simple ground that s. 9 and s. 12 of the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, show clearly what construction should be placed on the word “convicted” as there used. It is unnecessary, therefore, to decide any of the questions which have been so ably argued by counsel for the prisoner.
- B Section 9 of the Act enacts that whosoever shall put off any false or counterfeit coin shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof, that is to say, being found guilty of the misdemeanour, shall be liable to be imprisoned. The sentence was to follow the conviction. It is clear, therefore, that the intention of the legislature in enacting this was that, if a person was found guilty of an offence within the section, the legislature meant that to be treated as a conviction,
- C and used the word “convicted” as meaning having been found guilty. In this case, the prisoner was clearly found guilty, for, on looking at the certificate, it shows that. It is true that there is no mention in it of an actual judgment or sentence, but that she had been found guilty the certificate established beyond all question.
- The prisoner was indicted under s. 12 of the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, which creates this new offence, and enacts that whosoever having been convicted of any
- D such misdemeanour, or crime and offence, as in any of the last three preceding sections mentioned, that is to say, s. 9, s. 10 and s. 11, shall afterwards commit any of the misdemeanours, or crimes and offences, in any of the sections mentioned, shall be guilty of felony. The statute, therefore, makes that a felony which, had it been the first occasion on which the prisoner had been convicted, would have been a misdemeanour. The prisoner having pleaded guilty to the charge, in order
- E to prove the previous conviction the certificate was put in and was admitted without objection. That certificate shows undoubtedly that the prisoner had been previously convicted. Such conviction was under s. 9, and she pleaded guilty to having committed a similar offence to that of which she had been convicted under s. 9. Therefore, it seems to us that she comes directly within the language of s. 12, and is guilty of the felony of which it is stated in the Case she has been
- F convicted. It seems to me and to my learned brothers that the Case is beyond all argument when one comes to read s. 9 and s. 12. The conviction must, therefore, be affirmed.

Divorce—Adultery—Defence to charge—Insanity.

At the date of the filing of a husband's petition for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery, the wife was insane. Her guardian ad litem pleaded that, if she had committed adultery, she was not at the time responsible for her actions or capable of understanding the guilty nature of her acts, and so was not legally competent to consent to them.

Held: if, at the time of the acts of adultery, the wife was capable of appreciating the nature of the act and its probable consequences, her insanity was no defence, and, on the evidence, the defence of insanity failed.

Quære, whether such insanity as would entitle an accused person to an acquittal on an indictment for a criminal offence would constitute a valid defence to a claim for relief in a Divorce Court on the ground of adultery.

Petition by the husband for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery with divers men unknown.

The parties were married at St. Giles's Church, Camberwell, Surrey, in 1874, the age of the husband being twenty-eight and that of the wife twenty. There was no issue of the marriage. Shortly after the marriage they went to Monte Video, where they remained about twelve years, during which time the husband carried on the business of a corn merchant. While on the voyage, the wife confessed to the husband that she had led a life of immorality before marriage, and had contracted a venereal disease. In 1886 they returned to this country, and subsequently settled in Hertfordshire. They lived happily together until about 1890, when the wife's feelings towards her husband suddenly changed. In the course of that year, she expressed a wish to go to London, for the alleged purpose of consulting a doctor; and, on the husband offering to go with her, or to send a servant to accompany her, she persistently declared that she would go alone. Accordingly, in July, 1890, she went to London, and did, in fact, consult the doctor who had formerly attended her, and who assured her that there was nothing the matter with her. She engaged lodgings in Bernard Street, Brunswick Square, and, while residing there, on several occasions she took men to the house and committed adultery with them in her rooms. The identity of the men was unknown to the landlady, and it appeared that the wife had met them casually in the streets. The wife wrote to her husband informing him that she had committed adultery, and expressing her intention to do so again. She suggested that he should apply for a divorce, and added that, if he did not care to get a divorce, he would have to maintain her. In an interview which she subsequently had with the husband's solicitor, she repeated these statements.

The husband did not at once file his petition, being unwilling to cast her off altogether, and negotiations took place with a view to a separation by deed. These, however, were broken off, owing to the husband's advisers insisting upon, and the wife objecting to, the clause dum casta vixerit. On Aug. 18, the husband's solicitor had an interview with the wife, on which occasion she stated to him that she knew perfectly well that she was frequently committing adultery, and she fully intended to go on doing so. On Sept. 23, she went, clad only in her night-dress, to a neighbouring police-station, and asked the police to protect her from some imaginary danger. She talked in an incoherent manner about "knives" and

A "poison." She was then undoubtedly insane, and was subsequently taken to an asylum, where she had since remained. It appeared, from the evidence of the husband, that before she left him in July, 1890, she had at various times talked about "poison," and had accused him of administering to her some poisonous drug, with the alleged object of weakening her sexual passions and of reducing her to the same state, in this respect, as she said he was himself in. The wife being, B at the time the petition was presented, confined in an asylum, her brother was appointed to act as her guardian ad litem. In the answer put in by him on her behalf, he formally denied the alleged acts of adultery, and said that the wife was of unsound mind at the dates when the acts were said to have been committed. He further pleaded, "that if she did commit any or either of the alleged acts of adultery she was at the time not in any way responsible for her actions or capable C of understanding the guilty nature of the acts which she committed; and that she was not legally competent to consent to the commission of such acts."

D SIR CHARLES BUTT, P., in delivering judgment, said.—Even assuming the wife to have been of unsound mind and subject to insane delusions on some points which have been referred to, I am of opinion, that, if at the time she committed adultery, she was capable of appreciating the nature of the act and its probable consequences, such insanity would be no defence to the husband's claim to have his marriage dissolved. The case, albeit a very painful one, is not one which E presents much difficulty. There can be no possible doubt that the acts of adultery alleged against the wife are fully established by the evidence which has been called in support of those charges. In addition to this, the wife has written letters confessing adultery. It was, however, contended, on behalf of the wife, that, at the time when the acts of adultery were committed by her, she was of unsound mind and not in any way responsible for her actions, or capable of appreciating the guilty F nature of those acts, and that she was, in law, incapable of consenting to the commission of any of them. But this allegation that she was incapable of understanding their nature and consequence is absolutely negatived by the evidence which has been adduced.

There remains, however, for decision the question whether the wife was, at the time of the adultery, so insane as to render her then state of mind a defence to the suit. The evidence has clearly established as a fact that, at the time when the G improper intercourse with men unknown occurred, the wife, though not absolutely sane or free from delusions, was perfectly capable of appreciating the nature of the acts which she was committing and the consequences which those acts would probably entail. That being so, if the acts in question had been not only criminal but punishable by the criminal law, the defence of insanity could not have prevailed. That view probably goes further than is necessary for the purposes of the H present case, because I am by no means certain—and I express no opinion on this point—that such insanity as would entitle an accused person to an acquittal on a criminal indictment would constitute a valid defence to a claim for relief in this court on the ground of adultery.

I In order that the wife may be under no difficulty in carrying the case to a higher tribunal, should she be so advised, I desire to state that the present decision is based on a finding, that the wife left her home under an insane delusion that her husband was administering, or was attempting to administer, poison to her, and that she believed, at the time she committed the adultery, that this act of hers might probably be the means of bringing about a divorce. That being my view of the case, I hold that the defence of insanity fails, and that the husband is entitled to the relief which he prayed for. I, therefore, pronounce a decree nisi.

Appeal by the husband from an order of GORELL BARNES, J.

On Mar. 17, 1893, the wife filed a petition for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, and the next day her husband filed a petition for divorce on the ground of adultery. The suits were afterwards consolidated. On Mar. 19, the wife presented a petition for alimony pendente lite. The husband had an income of about £4,000 a year, and the wife had separate property producing an income of about £280 a year. On June 23, an order was made directing the husband to allow the wife alimony pendente lite at the rate of £500 a year, in addition to her separate income. In August, the wife took out a summons for her husband to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay her taxed costs of suit up to the time of setting down the cause, and to pay into court or give security for a sufficient sum of money to cover her future costs of and incident to the hearing. The summons came before the judge on Aug. 12, who directed the parties to go before the registrar.

On Nov. 17, the registrar reported as follows:

"It having been referred to me to report as to the means respectively of the husband and wife in this suit, and whether, having regard to their respective

A incomes, the husband should be ordered to pay the wife's costs already incurred, and to secure to the wife the costs of the hearing or otherwise, I beg to report as follows: Since the allotment of alimony the solicitors for both parties have been before me, and I have carefully reconsidered their respective incomes. The husband's means are derived from various investments."

B He then made some observations with reference to the fluctuations in their value, and continued:

C "I think, therefore, that the husband's income may be considered to amount to about £4,000 a year. The wife has an income of £280 derived from various investments, and a further sum of £500 a year has been awarded her during the suit for alimony. The husband's income would therefore, after deducting £500 a year for alimony, amount to about £3,500, and the wife's, with the alimony, to £780—i.e., £280 would be her income absolutely, and a further allowance of £500 a year, but only during the suit. The suit is an expensive one, as there have already been two commissions, at the husband's instance, to France. The wife's costs already incurred amount (subject to taxation) to £318, and £90 have been already paid to her in respect of these costs, and probably about another £50 will be incurred before the trial. It is submitted that the husband should be ordered to pay the costs already incurred and pay or secure the costs of the hearing."

D On Nov. 20, the case came before GORELL BARNES, J., who made the order asked by the summons. During the argument it was admitted that the £6,000 which produced the wife's income of £280 a year, was her absolute property.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the husband from an order of GORELL BARNES, J., directing him to pay the wife's costs already incurred, and to pay or secure her costs of the hearing. This order was made in accordance with the usual F practice of the Divorce Court that the husband should be ordered to put the wife in funds to pay her costs of the proceedings. The appeal is founded on the argument that there is no occasion for such an order, as the wife has property amply sufficient to enable her to defend herself. The suit has not yet come on for trial. Alimony pendente lite has been ordered at the rate of £500 per annum, and her own income, arising from separate property to which she is absolutely entitled, is £280 a year. The order for alimony was made after considering the incomes of herself and her husband, hers being £280 and his about £4,000 a year. After this G the wife took out a summons for the husband to show cause why he should not pay her costs up to the setting down for trial, and pay into court or secure a sufficient sum to cover her costs of the hearing. The matter was referred to the registrar, who, after considering the income of the husband and the income of the H wife, including the allowance for alimony, submitted that the husband should be ordered to pay the wife's costs already incurred, and to pay or secure the costs of the hearing. GORELL BARNES, J., made an order in conformity with this report.

Whether this order is right depends on r. 158 of the Rules and Regulations of Dec. 26, 1865. That rule, as amended in 1875, is as follows:

I "After directions given as to the mode of hearing or trial of a cause, or in an earlier stage of the cause, by order of the judge ordinary or of the registrar, to be obtained on summons, a wife who is petitioner or has entered an appearance as respondent in a cause, may file her bill or bills of costs for taxation as against her husband; and the registrar to whom such bills of costs are referred for taxation shall, when directions as to the mode of hearing or trial shall have been given, ascertain what is a sufficient sum of money to be paid into the registry, or what is a sufficient security to be given by the husband to cover the costs of the wife and incidental to the hearing of the cause; and shall thereupon issue an order upon the husband to pay or secure the said sum within a time to be fixed by the registrar: provided that in case the husband should, by reason of his wife having separate property, or for other reasons, dispute her right to recover any costs pending suit against him, the registrar may suspend the order to pay the wife's taxed costs, or to pay or secure the sum ascertained to be sufficient to cover her costs of and incidental to the hearing of the cause, for such length of time as shall seem to him necessary to enable the husband to obtain the decision of the court as to his liability."

Under that rule it is obvious that the judge has a discretion, not merely as to the amount, but whether an order ought under the circumstances to be made at all against the husband. I will assume that the present case is not within s. 49 of the Judicature Act, which prohibits appeals as to costs, for that section may, perhaps, be held not to apply to an order made pendente lite to pay costs or secure costs. Still the order is a discretionary order, and we should not interfere with it unless the judge has gone on a wrong principle, or gone so far wrong as to cause a miscarriage of justice.

It is contended on behalf of the husband that the judge has proceeded on a wrong principle, and that, on the question whether the husband shall be ordered to pay or secure the wife's costs, the relative incomes of the parties ought not to have been taken into consideration; but that the only question is whether the wife has property enough to enable her to pay her own costs. But the more I consider the case the more I think that the judge was right in considering their relative incomes. If we were to disturb the order as to costs, we should indirectly disturb the order as to alimony, for, if we were to make an order which would have the effect of reducing the wife's separate income by making it liable to costs, we should in fact be reducing the alimony. In considering the question of alimony, the court must consider the relative incomes, and so, reasoning back, since an order as to the wife's costs must affect the order for alimony, I cannot say that the judge was wrong in considering the relative incomes on the present occasion.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It is contended that the judge has proceeded on a wrong principle. In August, 1893, the wife took out a summons against her husband with reference to her costs. It was referred to the registrar, who reported that the husband had an income of about £4,000 a year, out of which he had to pay £500 a year for alimony, and that the wife had separate property bringing in £280 a year, in addition to the £500 a year alimony. GORELL BARNES, J., made an order directing the husband to pay the wife's costs up to the hearing and to secure her future costs. It is contended that this is wrong because the wife has separate property sufficient to pay costs. But, if we look at r. 158, we shall see that GORELL BARNES, J., was right. [His LORDSHIP read the rule, and continued:] In the proviso to this rule, "having separate property" must be read "having sufficient separate property." What is "sufficient" separate property? It has been argued that no order can be made against the husband if the wife has property which can be charged with her solicitor's costs, and is sufficient in amount to pay them. I do not think that the true meaning of the rule. An order has been made for alimony, and, if we were to reverse the order now appealed from, the alimony of £500 a year which was considered just when the wife had, in fact, £280 a year of her own would have to be adjusted. I think that it was for GORELL BARNES, J., to decide what was sufficient separate property to make it right to refuse an order for costs pending suit. He may take into consideration what the husband has, but the main point is, has the wife sufficient separate property to prevent the order from being made? Of that question he is the judge, and we cannot say that, in deciding as he has, he has done wrong in taking into consideration the relative means of the parties.

DAVEY, L.J.—Prima facie, a husband suing his wife is, by the practice of the Divorce Court, liable to be ordered to make provision for her costs. Whether there are circumstances sufficient to take a case out of that rule it is for the judge of the court below to say. If it were shown that GORELL BARNES, J., proceeded on a wrong principle, or took circumstances into consideration which he ought not to

A have taken into consideration, the appeal ought to succeed; but whether he exercised his discretion wisely as to amount is a question with which we ought not to interfere. It has been contended that the decision proceeded on a wrong principle, because it was founded on the relative incomes of the husband and wife, which it is said ought not to have been taken into consideration. What was it the learned judge had to decide? Whether the wife had a sufficient separate income to induce

B the courts to abstain from making an order for her costs. In my opinion, before coming to a conclusion on that, the income of the husband ought to be taken into consideration, for the means of the wife to defend the action must in some measure depend on what is necessary for her maintenance, and the wife of a man with £4,000 a year is entitled to spend more on her maintenance than the wife of a poorer man. Again, the alimony was settled with regard to the husband's means,

C and to alter the order now under appeal would practically interfere with the alimony. I am of opinion that GORELL BARNES, J., took nothing into consideration which he ought not to have taken, and that his discretion ought not to be interfered with.

GREEN v. CHELSEA WATERWORKS CO.

Statutory Duty—Damage caused in performance—No negligence of statutory undertakers—Water—Water-pipe laid under statutory powers bursting and causing damage—Liability of waterworks company.

G The defendants, under statutory powers, laid down a main water-pipe in a street near the plaintiffs' premises. The pipe burst, and water from it poured into the plaintiffs' premises causing damage to their stock. In an action for damages the jury found that the damage was not caused by the defendants' negligence in the management of the water-pipe.

Held: as the defendants were only doing what they were authorised to do under statutory powers and had not been guilty of any negligence, they were not liable for the damage caused.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of MATHEW, J., on further consideration in an action tried before him with a special jury.

The plaintiffs were fly proprietors, carrying on their business at 141, Upper Richmond Road, Putney, and the defendants were a waterworks company, authorised by certain statutes, namely, the Chelsea Waterworks Acts, 1852, 1875, and 1887 (15 & 16 Vict., c. clvi; 38 & 39 Vict., c. cviii; 50 & 51 Vict., c. xciv), to construct and maintain certain waterworks. The plaintiffs in their statement of claim alleged that the defendants had laid down and were the owners of a main water-pipe which passed along Putney Hill and near to the plaintiffs' premises, that this water-pipe was constantly filled with large quantities of water, and that, on Jan. 10, 1889, the water-pipe burst and the water therefrom poured down into the plaintiffs' premises, and did great damage to the plaintiffs' premises, horses and stock, and other property thereon. In the alternative, they claimed for loss and damage through the defendants' negligence. The defendants pleaded that they were empowered by their Acts and were obliged to construct and maintain the waterworks, and that the main was duly laid and maintained under and in pursuance of their statutory powers, and not otherwise. They also pleaded that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action, on the ground that the defendants, being under a statutory obligation to supply water, were not liable for damage by its escape, unless caused by the negligence of the defendants, and they denied that they were guilty of any negligence, and said that the main was properly and skilfully constructed and laid down and kept in proper repair. The jury found that the damage to the plaintiffs' premises was not caused by the defendants' negligence in the management of their mains. On the question whether the defendants were liable as insurers, which the trial judge reserved for further consideration, he held that the defendants were not liable. The plaintiffs appealed. F

A Henry Kisch for the plaintiffs.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Moulton, Q.C., and English Harrison for the defendants.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In my opinion, this is an experiment which ought not to succeed. Counsel for the plaintiffs has exercised his ingenuity in inviting the court to lay down the law differently from the way in which it ought to be laid down. So far as the action is based on negligence it is not maintainable, because the jury have found that there was no negligence. Then on what principle can the defendants be held liable except negligence? It was argued that they were liable by reason of the doctrine in Rylands v. Fletcher (1), and it was said that this was like the case of a landowner who stores water on his land so as to become a source of danger to his neighbours, and that, consequently, the defendants were bound to show that they were relieved by the Acts of Parliament under which they were constituted from the duty of keeping the water in their pipes. The fault of that argument is in the major proposition. Rylands v. Fletcher (1) was not a case of a company authorised to lay down water pipes by Act of Parliament. It was a case of a private individual storing water on his own land for his own purposes. There was no negligence on his part, but the principle of that case, as explained by LORD BLACKBURN in his judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber (L.R. 1 Exch. at pp. 279, 280), was that

“the person who for his own purposes brings on his land and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril, and if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. . . . This, we think, is established to be the law, whether the things so brought be beasts, or water, or filth, or stench.”

And this is cited with approval by LORD CAIRNS, L.C., in his opinion in the House of Lords on appeal from that court. It is possible that that principle might have been applied to companies having statutory authority to make railways or carry water, but the court has declined to extend it to such cases. The same argument was used without success in Dunn v. Birmingham Canal Co. (2), where, without any negligence on the part of the company, water from the canal had flooded the plaintiff's mine. It was there held that the defendants were not liable expressly on the ground that the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (1) was inapplicable to a company which was doing what it was authorised to do by Act of Parliament. That case is not to be extended beyond the legitimate principle on which the House of Lords decided it. If it were extended as far as strict logic might require, it would be a very oppressive decision. Here the defendants were only doing what they were authorised to do by their Act, and, as they were not guilty of negligence, they are not liable for damage. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal by the judgment creditors against an order of the Divisional Court (POLLOCK, B., and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.), affirming an order of the registrar of the Stafford County Court, setting aside a bankruptcy notice issued against the judgment debtor.

On Nov. 5, 1889, the Rev. N. T. Hughes and others, who were trustees of a charity known as St. John's Hospital, Northampton, issued a writ against the debtor, M. Howes, and his wife Elizabeth, for damages for breach of a covenant contained in a lease for lives. The writ set out not only the Rev. N. T. Hughes' name in full, but also the names of all the other trustees of the charity in question, but did not state that they were trustees. The judgment debtor appeared to the writ. On Dec. 5, a statement of claim was delivered, by which the creditors alleged that they were "the present trustees" of the hospital of St. John, and the owners of the reversion in the demised premises and that the claim against the debtor was as a legal personal representative of a deceased person, and also as beneficially interested in the lease. No statement of defence was delivered, and on April 24, 1890, interlocutory judgment was signed for want of defence against the debtor, and the question of damages was referred. On Aug. 11, final judgment was entered for £166 11s. 4d. against the debtor. The note of the judgment described it as having been obtained by the "Rev. N. T. Hughes and others, plaintiffs." No mention was there made of the names of the other trustees, or that the creditors were trustees. On Jan. 22, 1892, a bankruptcy notice was issued against the debtor, and duly served on him, requiring him within seven days after service

"to pay to the Rev. N. T. Hughes and others (the trustees of St. John's Hospital, Northampton), of the convalescent home, Weston Favell, in the county of Northampton, the sum of £250 16s. 6d. claimed by them as being

- A the amount due on a final judgment obtained by them against you in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, dated Aug. 11, 1891;"
- or to secure or compound for the same, or to satisfy the court
- "that you have a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand against the said Rev. N. T. Hughes and others (the trustees of St. John's Hospital, Northampton), which equals or exceeds,"
- B etc. On the application of the judgment debtor, the registrar of the county court set aside the bankruptcy notice. The judgment creditors appealed.
- Muir Mackenzie* for the judgment creditors.
H. Reed for the judgment debtor.
- C LORD ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. This bankruptcy notice does not follow the terms of the judgment in the sense in which it ought to do so. In the judgment, the creditors are described "Hughes and others," whereas the bankruptcy notice requires payment to be made to "Hughes and others (trustees of St. John's Hospital)." That addition, although in law it may be mere surplusage, yet alters the character of the creditors in such a way as would probably puzzle the debtor. The notice is not in the terms of the judgment, as required by the Act. I go further. I say that, if a creditor obtains a judgment by default, and chooses to accept a judgment expressed in such terms as in this case (he need not accept such a judgment), and then issues a bankruptcy notice in similar terms, it is so unfair as to bring the case within the equitable jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court, and the court may refuse to enforce the notice.
- E BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The bankruptcy notice does not follow the judgment because the words "trustees of St. John's Hospital" are added. We must either take cognisance of that addition or not. If we do, then the notice varies from the judgment. We must assume that "Hughes and others" means the persons named in the writ, but the addition "trustees of," etc., is not necessarily a description of the persons suing. If we reject the addition altogether, then the
- F bankruptcy notice is in the terms of the judgment, but the question arises whether a bankruptcy notice calling on the debtor to pay "Hughes and others" can be a good notice. There is no information given who the others are, and it would be most oppressive to sanction such a bankruptcy notice. This is not a technical matter. The bankruptcy law is a law of a penal character, and it is not right that forms should be so varied as to cause confusion to the parties to whom they are
- G addressed.
- A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the judgment, Hughes and the other creditors claim against the debtor in their personal capacity, but in the bankruptcy notice they are claiming in a representative capacity as trustees, or, if they are not, they have not given their respective addresses.

Libel—Parties—Plaintiff—Corporation—Company—Capacity to bring action.

Although a corporation or company cannot maintain an action for libel in respect of anything reflecting on its members personally, yet it can maintain an action for a libel reflecting on the management of its trade or business and injuriously affecting the corporation or company as distinct from the individuals which compose it. The words complained of must attack the corporation or company in the method of conducting its affairs, must accuse it of fraud or mismanagement, or must attack its financial position. To maintain an action the corporation or company need not prove special damage.

Libel—Fair comment—Questions for judge and jury—Public interest—Fairness of comment—Duty of jury.

Where to an action for libel the defence of fair comment on a matter of public interest is pleaded the question whether the matter commented on is one of public interest is for the judge, and, the judge having held that there is some evidence that the comment is unfair, the question whether it is in fact unfair is for the jury. In deciding that question the jury must not dwell too much on isolated passages, but must consider the words complained of as a whole. If there are such deviations from absolute accuracy as to make the comment unfair, they must find for the plaintiff, but if there are no such deviations, or the deviation is minute and within the latitude of fair discussion and the region of that diversity of opinion which may be fairly and reasonably entertained by different persons on the same subject-matter, they should find for the defendant.

In an action for libel damage is presumed and the plaintiff need not prove any particular damage. The damages are at large, and the jury can give such damages as they think right having regard to the conduct of the parties and all the circumstances of the case.

G Application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial on appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial of the action before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and a jury at Newcastle.

The action was brought by the plaintiff company to recover damages for a libel contained in a newspaper belonging to the defendants, called the "North-Eastern Daily Gazette." The plaintiffs were incorporated under the Companies Acts and carried on a colliery business, owning a large number of pitmen's cottages, in a colliery village. These cottages formed a large part of the village, and were occupied by the pitmen rent free as part of their wages. The village contained about 2,000 inhabitants, and was under the jurisdiction of a rural sanitary authority. The libel was contained in an article headed: "Homes of the pitmen. South Hetton. By our special commissioner." This was one of a series of articles dealing with the state of colliery villages in the county. The article in the present case, in effect, described the village generally as being unfit for habitation according to the rules of health and morality, and as being in a most insanitary condition. In their statement of claim the plaintiffs did not allege any special damage, and they did not prove any special damage at the trial. The defendants pleaded that the action did not lie and also that the statements complained of were bona fide comments upon a matter of public interest, made honestly and without malice. The action was tried before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and a jury at Newcastle. The Lord Chief Justice held that the matter was one of public interest, and asked the jury to find whether the comment was fair, or not. He directed them that, if the comment was not fair and the statements tend to the discredit of the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs were entitled to maintain the action. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs with £25 damages, and the defendants now applied for judgment or for a new trial.

Nov. 28, 1893. The following judgments were read.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case an action was brought by the South Hetton Coal Co., Ltd., against the defendants to recover damages for an alleged libel published in a newspaper belonging to the defendants. This alleged libel was contained in an account given by a representative of the newspaper respecting the condition of things in a certain district. The action was tried at Newcastle before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and a jury. The jury found that the matter published was libellous. The Lord Chief Justice held that it related to a matter of public interest, but the jury found that the description was so exaggerated as not to be a fair description of the condition of things, and was, therefore, not fair comment. Thereupon, the learned judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs.

I have thought out for myself the questions of law in this case, and I have come to the conclusion that the law of libel is the same as regards all manner of parties, and that the question is always the same, namely, whether the jury are of opinion that the matter published would, with regard to the conduct of the plaintiff, lead persons of ordinary sense to look upon the plaintiff with hatred, contempt, or ridicule. That is always the question, whether the plaintiff is an individual, a firm, or a corporation. The application of that law is different, according to the different kinds of plaintiffs. There are some kinds of plaintiffs about whom things may be written which may lead ordinary people to entertain feelings of hatred, contempt, or ridicule, but there are other kinds of plaintiffs as to whom those same things could not lead people to entertain such feelings. For instance, if a man said that the manners of the plaintiff were grossly contrary to all proper sense of decency, that might lead ordinary people to entertain feelings of hatred, contempt, or ridicule towards him; but if the same thing was said as to the manners of a firm, or of a corporation, a firm or corporation cannot have manners, and in such a case, although the law is the same, the necessary conditions are wanting and the matter published is not a libel, because it could not lead to feelings of hatred, contempt, or ridicule towards a firm or corporation.

There are, however, other things which may be said as to the conduct of the plaintiff, when the plaintiff is a firm or corporation, which may be libellous. For instance, if you say of a man engaged in business that he conducts his business like a foolish man, that is a libel upon him in his business, that is, upon him in respect of his conduct in his business. With respect to such a man, if you only say that his goods are bad, it is for the jury to consider whether this was so said as to imply that his conduct in his business was bad. For instance, if the plaintiff is a wine merchant, and you say that there is a bad vintage, and the wine of that vintage is bad with him and with all merchants, that is no reflection upon the plaintiff in his business, but is only a reflection upon the goods, and is not a libel upon the plaintiff. If such a statement as that is made maliciously, and does injure the plaintiff, it only gives rise to an action upon the case, and not to an action for libel. If you say of a wine merchant that he has been selecting bad wine, that is a reflection upon him in his business, and may be a libel upon him in his business. In such a case the jury would have to say what was meant, and, if they find that the statement reflected upon the goods only, there is no libel; but, if they find otherwise, there is a libel.

A Then, with regard to a firm or a corporation, no exhaustive account can be given of the kinds of statement which are libellous, or are not libellous. The rule of law, however, is the same as in the case of an individual. If a firm or a corporation carry on a business, they may carry it on in such a way as to lead a person to say that they carried it on in a bad way. Such a statement would be a libel on the business, and the law is the same as in the case of an individual. That statement, B if true, would lead an ordinary person to say that they managed their business in so inefficient a way as to lead people to entertain feelings of contempt or ridicule towards them. It follows, therefore, that the law is the same in all respects in the case of a corporation and of an individual.

In an action for libel the damages are at large, and the plaintiff need not prove any particular damage. The jury can give such damages as they may think right, C having regard to the conduct of the parties and all the circumstances of the case. The law as to that is the same in the case of an individual, of a firm, and of a corporation. It is not necessary, therefore, for the plaintiffs to prove any special damage when they are a firm or a corporation. It is only necessary to prove the libel, and then the damages are at large in the hands of the jury. In this case, then, the only question was whether the statements complained of made allegations D as to the conduct of the plaintiffs in their business, that they carried it on in such an inefficient manner as to lead people, if the allegations were true, to entertain feelings of hatred, contempt, or ridicule towards the plaintiffs. In my opinion, the statements complained of, if not fair comment upon a matter of public interest, were such as to entitle the jury to find that they were defamatory of the plaintiffs.

Then comes the question whether this is a matter of public interest. The Lord E Chief Justice held that it was a matter of public interest, and I agree with him. The matter regarded so many people, and people of such a class, and the matter itself was so important, as, in my opinion, to make it matter of public interest that the conduct of the colliery proprietors should be criticised. Yet, if the matter is one of public interest, the person who criticises must do so with moderation, and if it is shown that the criticism was malicious, or so unfair as to be exaggerated, then such criticism is not fair comment upon a matter of public interest, F but is a libel for which damages can be recovered. If, however, it is a fair comment upon a matter of public interest, then it is not a libel at all, and the defendant is entitled to a verdict. If the matter complained of is fair comment upon a matter of public interest, that takes it out of the category of libels. Then comes the question whether there was in this case a sufficient exaggeration of description G to entitle the jury to say that the matter published went beyond a fair comment upon a matter of public interest. I am not prepared to say whether, if I had been on the jury, I would not have found that this was within the bounds of fair comment. I am inclined to think that it was, but I cannot say that the jury were not entitled to take a different view, and to say that so exaggerated and florid a description went beyond the limit, and was unfair, and that damages ought to be H awarded. I think that we cannot interfere with the verdict of the jury, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The libel complained of attacks the plaintiffs in respect of the management of their property as colliery proprietors. The defence is fair and bona fide comment on a matter of public interest. No action will lie if the defendant can prove that the words complained of are a fair and bona fide comment on a matter of public interest. The court decides whether the matter commented on is one of public interest; the jury, if the court is of opinion that there is some evidence that the comment is unfair, finds whether it is so in fact.

I I do not propose to go into the facts of the case at length, but shall state my view of the law on the questions raised. It is not contended that the words complained of are not prima facie defamatory. Three questions arise: (i) Will the action lie by the plaintiffs who are a corporation? (ii) Is the matter commented on one of public interest? (iii) Is the comment complained of fair and bona fide?

With regard to the first point I am of opinion that, although a corporation cannot maintain an action for libel in respect of anything reflecting upon them personally, yet they can maintain an action for a libel reflecting on the management of their trade or business, and this without alleging or proving special damage. The words complained of, in order to entitle a corporation or company to sue for libel or slander, must injuriously affect the corporation or company as distinct from the individuals which compose it. A corporation or company could not sue in respect of a charge of murder, or incest, or adultery, because it could not commit those crimes. Nor could it sue in respect of a charge of corruption, or for an assault, because a corporation cannot be guilty of corruption or of an assault, although the individuals composing it may be. The words complained of must attack the corporation or company in the method of conducting its affairs, must accuse it of fraud or mismanagement, or must attack its financial position. Can it be contended that, if words are written attributing to a banking company insolvency, an action will not lie, and that without alleging or proving special damage?

The limits of a corporation's right of action are those suggested by POLLOCK, C.B., in Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Co. v. Hawkins (1), where he says (4 H. & N. at pp. 90, 91):

"That a corporation at common law can sue in respect of a libel there is no doubt. It would be monstrous if a corporation could maintain no action for slander of title through which they lost a great deal of money. It could not sue in respect of an imputation of murder, or incest, or adultery, because it could not commit those crimes. Nor could it sue in respect of a charge of corruption, for a corporation cannot be guilty of corruption, although the individuals composing it may. But it would be very odd if a corporation had no means of protecting itself against wrong, and, if its property is injured by slander, it has no means of redress except by action. Therefore it appears to me clear that a corporation at common law may maintain an action for a libel by which its property is injured. Then, has a corporation created under [the Companies Acts] the same power? Though [the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856 (repealed Companies Act, 1862)] makes the partnership a corporation, Mr. Stammers says that this is merely for the purpose of carrying on the business mentioned in it, and that it can only sue in respect of matters necessarily incident to that purpose. But in order to carry on business it is necessary that the reputation of such a corporation should be protected, and therefore, in the case of libel or slander, it must have a remedy by action."

This was adopted by DAY, J., in Manchester Corpn. v. Williams (2), in which he says ([1891] 1 Q.B. at p. 96):

"The limits of a corporation's right of action for libel are those suggested by POLLOCK, C.B., in the case which has been referred to. A corporation may sue for a libel affecting property, not for one merely affecting personal reputation."

In a case of slandering a man in respect of his office, profession, or trade, it is not necessary to allege or prove special damage, nor is it necessary in the case of libelling a corporation or company in respect of their trade or business.

In my judgment, this action by the plaintiffs will lie. But is the matter commented on one of public interest? This is a question for the court. The attack upon the plaintiffs is in respect of the sanitary condition of their property, involving the health, comfort, and well-being of over 2,000 human beings. The sanitary condition of this large population is placed under the control of a public body who do not interpose. Can it be said that this alleged state of things is not a matter of grave public interest? It may be that there is no case in the books holding a matter like this one of public interest, but I am clearly of opinion that a matter like this now before the court may be made the subject of hostile criticism and of hostile animadversions, provided the language of the writer is kept within the limits of an honest intention to discharge a public duty. I agree with the

A Lord Chief Justice in holding this a matter of public interest. But is the comment fair and bona fide? This is essentially a question for the jury, provided there is any evidence upon which they may so find. This defence raised no question of privilege. The defence, in such a case, is that the words are not defamatory; that fair and proper comment is no libel. It is only, as was said by BOWEN, L.J., in Merivale v. Carson (3), when the writer goes beyond the limits of fair criticism that

B his criticism passes into the region of libel at all. It is for the jury to consider what impression would be produced in the mind of an unprejudiced reader who reads the report straight through, knowing nothing about the case beforehand. They must not dwell too much on isolated passages; they must consider the report as a whole. If there are such deviations from absolute accuracy as to make the comment unfair, they must find for the plaintiff; but if there are no such deviations,

C the deviation is minute, and within the latitude of fair discussion and within the region of that diversity of opinion which may be fairly and reasonably entertained by different persons upon the same subject-matter, they should find for the defendant.

Applying these rules to this case, I have come to the conclusion that the jury were justified in finding for the plaintiff. Whether I should have found the same

D verdict is not the question. If there was evidence upon which the jury might reasonably find as they did the verdict cannot be disturbed. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L.J.—This appeal raises questions of great importance and interest. The action is by a joint-stock company, incorporated and carrying on a colliery business,

E against the proprietors and publishers of a newspaper, for libel published in that paper. The alleged libel describes the condition of a village in which the miners and their families, to the number of about 2,000, are living, and it describes it as being unfit for habitation according to rules of health or morality. We are told that the miners are allowed to occupy the houses in this village rent free, and receive less money wages in consequence. The article goes into considerable

F detail as to the sanitary arrangements, water supply, overcrowding of the houses, and the like.

The first question is whether the subject of this article is a matter of public interest upon which it is lawful to make fair criticism or comment. Considering the extent of colliery business in this country, the enormous number of men employed in it, the legislative provisions that have of necessity been made concerning

G the mode of carrying it on, as, for instance, in the ventilation of coal mines; considering the number of people in this particular village, the fact that the houses in which they live are supplied by the colliery proprietors rent free as part of the colliers' wages, that this very village is within the jurisdiction of a rural sanitary authority, and that the article complained of seems, from the commencement of it, to be one of a series dealing with the houses of pitmen in the county of Durham,

H I am of opinion that the subject of the articles is a matter of public interest, and that a fair criticism upon such a subject would not be a libel at all: Campbell v. Spottiswoode (4), per LORD BLACKBURN; and Merivale v. Carson (3), per BOWEN, L.J. Whether, upon the whole, the article is fair criticism or comment is eminently a matter for a jury to decide.

The next and most important question is, whether this action will lie without

I allegation and proof of special damage. One of the differences between libel and slander is, that in an action for libel, i.e., where the defamatory statement is printed or written and published, and not merely communicated orally, generally speaking damage is presumed, and that which is called special damage, viz., the suffering some definite loss, need not be proved or alleged. But when the plaintiffs are two or more persons associated in partnership the only libel of which they can jointly complain is one which may injure their joint property or their joint trade or business. The same law is applicable to a certain extent to a trading corporation. Its property or its business may be injured by defamatory statements, whether written or oral. It has a trading character, the defamation of which may ruin it. If, for example, an individual, a private partnership, or a corporation were carrying on a trading business, and someone wrote and published an untrue statement that they were insolvent, or any other statement which might destroy their credit or paralyse their business, it is obvious that such a statement, if untrue, would be a libel. For a libel calculated to injure the business of a trading concern, is it the law that no action will lie unless special damage is alleged and proved? The general rule is that, in an action for libel against an individual, no proof of special damage is necessary. If such proof were necessary in order to lay a foundation for the action, it is obvious that in many cases the plaintiff would be put in a position of much difficulty.

But there is considerable authority upon the question. In the first place, if a slander be spoken calculated to injure an individual in his trade, it is not necessary to allege or prove special damage to found the action, that being an exception to the general rule that in actions of slander special damage must be alleged and proved: Phillips v. Jansen (5); Ingram v. Lawson (6); Hayward & Co. v. Hayward & Sons (7); [but see now Defamation Act, 1952, s. 2; 32 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 400]. It would be strange if, that being so in an action for slander, it should still be necessary to allege and prove special damage in an action, not for slander, but for libel of a person in respect of his trade: The presumption of damage in the case of libel is much stronger. In Le Fanu v. Malcolmson (8) the libel was upon the defendants as owners of factories, imputing that cruelties were practised in their treatment of the persons employed in them. There was no allegation of special damage, but the plaintiffs, it was held, could maintain a joint action, and were entitled to recover substantial damages. In Ingram v. Lawson (6) the action was brought three days after the publication of the libel, which was held to be a libel on the plaintiff in his business of a master mariner and ship-owner. There was no allegation of special damage. It was held that the plaintiff was not bound to wait until actual damage had been incurred. The jury were warranted in giving such damages as they thought fit for the publication of the libel and the injury to his character in the way of his business. The verdict was for £900, some evidence of general damage having been given. In Russell v. Webster (9), BRAMWELL, B., and PRIGOT, B., held that a libel published of the defendants as co-proprietors of a newspaper, being of a defamatory character and published of them in relation to their business, might be made the subject of a joint action without any proof of special damage, and that the jury might give general damages, that is, damages according to their discretion under all the circumstances of the case.

It is suggested that, although an individual can sue for a libel upon him in relation to his business, or even the members of a partnership may maintain a joint action for such a libel, yet that an incorporated trading company cannot. But why not? Such a corporation has a trading character which may be destroyed by libel. If an individual or the members of a firm may sue for a libel imputing to them insolvency because of the damage which such a libel is calculated to do to them in relation to their business, could it possibly be maintained that a trading corporation could not sue for a like libel? Again, the authorities seem to show that such a corporation can sue for such a libel as an individual might. In Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Co. v. Hawkins (1), POLLOCK, C.B., held that a trading corporation formed under the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856, had the same power, saying this (4 H. & N. at pp. 90, 91):

"In order to carry on business it is necessary that the reputation of such a corporation should be protected, and therefore, in cases of libel or slander, it must have a remedy by action."

The other judges of the Court of Exchequer concurred. It had previously been held in Williams v. Beaumont (10) that a trading association, not incorporated, entitled by Act of Parliament to sue or be sued in the name of its chairman, might

A sue in his name for a libel on the association in the way of its business. In Thorley's Cattle Food Co. v. Massam (11) the plaintiffs were a company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, and had brought the action for a libel, and BRAMWELL, L.J., said (14 Ch.D. at p. 784):

B "I am satisfied that this was a libel on the plaintiffs in the way of their trade and calculated to do them injury, and consequently an action is maintainable."

I, therefore, am of opinion that a trading corporation may sue for a libel calculated to injure them in respect of their business, and may do so without any proof of damage, general or special. Of course, if there be no such evidence, the damages given will probably be small.

C With respect to the article now in question, it is suggested that it does not impute anything to the corporate company. I cannot agree in this. It states in the commencement that they are the owners of the colliery, and throughout the meaning of the writer seems to me to be to throw great blame upon them for the manner in which the colliers are housed in this village.

Then, is the article fair? Does it come within the rules which allow fair criticism and comment upon a matter of public interest? Not much fault has been D found with that part of it which consists of comment or criticism properly so called. It is the accuracy of the statements of fact which is called in question. According to the evidence many of the houses in this village are little better than hovels—low buildings consisting of one room on the ground floor, and an unceiled garret under a slated roof above. Others, scarcely any larger, have the ground floor divided into two small rooms. Many of these houses have no privies at all. E Very many have none provided by the company, but the occupiers have provided some in their plots of garden which are not immediately attached to the houses. From the houses all the refuse is taken in boxes and thrown into open pits in the streets, from which the company's carts carry it away. The water supply consists of water pumped from those pits into large iron tanks, from whence it is conducted to taps here and there in the streets. There is no restriction upon the occupiers taking lodgers, and this is done to a great extent. No one who has attended to F the evils which result from overcrowding of houses and want of decent sanitary accommodation can resist the conviction that this state of things deserves severe comment. I am not able to say that there are not in this article misstatements and exaggerations which were evidence for the jury of unfairness. But the state of things admitted to exist is so serious that I should not have been inclined to interfere if the verdict had been for the defendants. However, as I began by saying, the question whether the article is fair is eminently a question for the jury. G It seems to me impossible to hold that there was not some evidence of unfairness, and, therefore, I think that we cannot, according to the rules which we observe on motions for new trials, interfere with the verdict in this case.

[Reported [1893] 1 Q.B. 700; 62 L.J.M.C. 129; 68 L.T. 690; 57 J.P. 645; 41 W.R. 594; 9 T.L.R. 402; 4 R. 388]

Coal Mine—Wages—Payment by weight of mineral gotten—Deductions in respect of excessive "dirt"—Legality—Right of miner to payment for all coal gotten—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict., c. 58), s. 12.

Contract—Severability of promise—Illegal term—Separate term based on independent good consideration.

By the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, s. 12 (1): "Where the amount of wages paid to any of the persons employed in a mine depends on the amount of mineral gotten by them, those persons shall be paid according to the actual weight gotten by them of the mineral contracted to be gotten, and the mineral gotten by them shall be truly weighed at a place as near to the pit mouth as is reasonably practicable. Provided that nothing in this section shall preclude the owner . . . or manager of the mine from agreeing with the persons employed in the mine that deductions shall be made in respect of stones or substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten . . . such deductions being determined in such special mode as may be agreed upon. . . ."

A miner was employed in a mine under a contract which provided that wages were to be calculated upon the amount of coal gotten by him, and that fourteen days' notice should be given on either side to terminate the employment. A system of fines or forfeitures which was agreed between the employers and the workmen under the contract provided that, if the amount of "dirt" in a tub after the coal had been riddled exceeded specified weights, the miner who sent up the tub should forfeit his remuneration in respect of specified proportions of the contents of the tub. The miner left his employment without giving notice, and the owner proceeded against him for damages.

Held: (i) under s. 12 (1) the miner was entitled to be paid for all the coal sent up by him, the only valid deduction being in respect of material sent up which was not coal, and, therefore, the provisions in the contract for forfeiture were in breach of the subsection and illegal; but (ii) the term of the contract providing for 14 days' notice to terminate it was based on good consideration and was severable from the illegal provisions relating to the deductions, and, therefore, the miner was liable to the mineowner in damages for his breach of contract.

A Appeal by Patrick Kearney from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (GRANTHAM and CHARLES, JJ.), dismissing his appeal upon a Case stated by justices for the county of Cumberland.

At a petty sessions held at the Petty Sessional Court House at Whitehaven on Mar. 10, 1892, a summons taken out by the complainants, the Whitehaven Colliery Co., under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, against the defendant, Patrick Kearney, came on for hearing. The complainant claimed the sum of 7s. 6d. as damages for breach by the defendant of a contract entered into between them and the defendant, such breach of contract being his neglect to proceed to or perform his duties as a collier in William Pit, on Thursday and Friday, Mar. 3 and 4, 1892. Evidence of a contract in writing was tendered, but the contract was not put in. It was admitted that the contract was subject to fourteen days' notice on either side, and that the wages of the defendant were to be calculated upon the weight of coal obtained by him. It was proved that the defendant was in the employment of the complainants on Mar. 3 and 4, 1892, and that he did not proceed to his work on those days. He had given notice of his intention to quit the employment of the complainants on Mar. 12, 1892. In consequence of the absence of the defendant and other miners on Mar. 3 and 4, 1892, the complainants incurred loss, such loss being the wages paid to enginemmen and other men and boys employed on the surface and underground and in receipt of a fixed rate of wages, who had to be and were in attendance at the pit, but whose work was rendered unremunerative owing to the absence of the colliers. It was proved that the lampman, acting under orders, withheld the lamps of three men named Alfred Coles, William Cooper, and John Mitchell, who attended at the pit top on Mar. 3, 1892, and that all the men then and there assembled, including the defendant, thereupon refused to descend the pit, and they did not in fact descend the pit nor work from that time up to and inclusive of the day upon which the summons was heard, namely, Mar. 10, 1892. The justices found as a fact that the withholding of the three lamps was not a dismissal of the men to whom they belonged, but was an intimation that they had to speak to the manager, and that the men so understood it. The manager wished to speak to the three men in consequence of the excessive amount of dirt which, it was alleged, they had been sending up with their coal. The justices found that a system of fines or forfeitures had been for some time in force at the pit in respect of dirt sent up with the coal, and that a revised scale had been arranged between the employers and the workmen on Dec. 2, 1891. The scale of fines and forfeiture then arranged provided that there should be no fine or forfeiture if after the coal was riddled the amount of dirt in the tub did not exceed 25 lb. If the amount of dirt after riddling exceeded 25 lb. and did not exceed 35 lb., one-half of the tub was to be forfeited, the collier who sent the tub up receiving payment in respect of one-half only of the total contents of the tub. If the amount of dirt after riddling exceeded 35 lb., then the whole tub was to be forfeited. The tubs weighed about 15 cwt. each. The dirt referred to was not coal, nor of the nature nor substance of coal, but a mineral substance known locally as "metal." The defendant's lamp was not withheld from him, nor was he in any way prevented by the complainants from proceeding to his work, nor was there any evidence that coal sent up by him had been forfeited, or that any complaint had been made with reference to his coal.

I It was submitted by the defendant's solicitor that the above-mentioned system of fines or forfeitures was illegal, that when the lamps of the three men were withheld it amounted to a dismissal or termination of the contract with them, and was notice or intimation to the defendant that the complainants were seeking to impose a condition upon their contract with him which was illegal, and that the defendant was, therefore, justified in refusing to work. The justices held that the defendant was not justified in refusing to work and carry out his contract, and that there was no notice to him that the complainants were seeking to impose an illegal condition upon their contract with him. The defendant's solicitor further submitted that, he being paid by piece work, was not liable in damages if he neglected to continue his work, unless by such neglect injury was caused to the employer's property or machinery. The justices held that he was liable in damages, and ordered him to pay to the complainants the sum of 7s. 6d., that being, in their opinion, a fair proportion of the actual total loss sustained by the complainants for wages paid by them in respect of the pit on Mar. 3 and 4, 1892, and rendered unremunerative in consequence of the absence of the defendant and other men on those days.

The questions of law for the opinion of the court were: (i) Were the justices right in holding that the defendant was not justified in leaving his work without notice? (ii) In the event of the defendant not being justified in leaving his work without notice, were they right in holding that he was liable in damages to the complainants?

The Divisional Court gave judgment in favour of the complainants, GRANTHAM, J., being of opinion that the agreement as to fines was not illegal, and CHARLES, J., that the agreement was illegal, but that the stipulation as to notice was binding, and could be enforced. The defendant appealed.

Willis, Q.C., and Atherley Jones for the defendant.

Finlay, Q.C., and Mattinson for the complainants.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, but I am of opinion that the judgment of CHARLES, J., was right, and I do not agree with the judgment of GRANTHAM, J. I think that the deductions which were agreed to in this case were illegal deductions, but I think that, there being different promises, as distinct from the consideration, though one promise is illegal, yet the rest of the promises can be supported and be insisted upon. The court, therefore, is of opinion that the stipulation as to notice was a legal and binding promise; it is that stipulation which has been broken, and the owners may insist on their remedies for the breach of that contract. The point relating to the illegality of the stipulation in respect of fines for dirt depends upon the true construction of the provisions of s. 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, with respect to such a matter.

That section has been construed by the House of Lords in Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne (1). I cannot agree with the suggestion that this court ought to say that the opinions of the House of Lords are founded upon particular propositions as to the meaning of an Act of Parliament, and that though it is clear that the Lords meant to put a certain interpretation upon the Act, we ought to disregard that part of their opinions because it was not necessary for the decision of the case. I do not think that that is the proper way to deal with opinions of the House of Lords. I take the decision of the House of Lords in Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne (1) to be founded upon the proposition enunciated in express terms by all the noble Lords. That proposition, and the grounds for it, are most clearly stated by LORD HALSBURY. He says that taking the section as a whole, and construing the first part of the section and the proviso together, one will see what is the true construction of the first part. If you place one construction upon it the proviso has hardly any effect; if you place the other construction upon it the clause and the proviso work harmoniously together. He says that the phraseology used in the first part of the section is general, and, therefore, can be construed into a concrete form by looking at the course of business in coal-mining. He applies that well-known rule of construction, and says that the words "where the amount of wages paid to any of the persons employed . . . depends on the amount of mineral gotten by them," construed in one way, might mean the amount of actual mineral gotten, but that if you look at the course of business they might have another meaning. There is a well-known course of business among miners; miners working in a coal mine get a quantity of what I may call "stuff," which they put into tubs and send up to the surface. When the stuff has come to the surface it is taken to be the mineral sent up, though in strict language it is not all mineral, but is partly something else. LORD HALSBURY, therefore, says, that, if the first part of the section

A stood alone, we could give it that meaning, but that the proviso makes it clear that we ought not to do so.

The phrase "amount of mineral gotten" would mean the amount of stuff which the miner gets and sends up, whatever is in the tub, including dirt and other substances. If that were so, the mineowner would have to pay wages for mineral which practically was not gotten, that is, for something other than mineral gotten
B in the course of mining unless the statute provided some means of avoiding that result. We know that it would be practically impossible for him to have every tub weighed for dirt. The Act, therefore, by means of the proviso, arranges a method of preventing that result, and says that deductions shall be agreed in respect of stones or substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten. From what are such deductions to be made? Not from the mineral itself, but in
C respect of that which is mixed with it, which is not strictly speaking mineral. Those deductions can only be made in a certain way. They cannot be made without giving the miner an opportunity of seeing that it is properly done. An agreement must be made in the terms of the proviso, in order that the miner may see that it is fairly done. By the proviso, therefore, the mineowner may agree with the workmen as to the method of making deductions. If they do not agree, there
D is no method specified; if they do agree, they must agree that the deductions shall be made in a particular manner.

If that is the true view of the enactment, that which is to be deducted is the extraneous substance which adds to the weight, and, therefore, the deduction is to be made from weight. The deduction is not to be made from the weight of mineral actually gotten, but in respect of "stones or substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten."
E The deduction is to be made from the weight of the tub, and is not a direct deduction from wages but a deduction from weight, and in that way is in effect a deduction from wages. The wording of the subsection and proviso leads us to the conclusion that the deduction is to be made in respect of the weight of something which is not mineral, from the weight of that which is sent up in the tub. As to the other part of the proviso, relating to tubs being
F improperly filled, it works in the same way. I think that it means that you are to take the weight of the tub and deduct from it that which has got into the tub by improper filling. As suggested by some of the Lords in Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne (1), that may apply to the inclusion of too much dust or slack; that may be a deduction from weight by taking from the weight of the tub the improper quantity of dust. I take it, therefore, that the House of Lords said, in Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne (1), that under the Act there could only be a deduction
G from weight, and that so far as weight was concerned there could only be deducted that which was not mineral. There could only be a deduction from weight, and from the weight of the tub sent up from the mine.

Is that the true view of the decision of the House of Lords? LORD HALSBURY says (14 App. Cas. at pp. 234, 235):

H "It is obvious further that the draftsman, or some person familiar with mining, feared whether in creating that duty and imposing the obligation to pay according to the weight so ascertained—knowing that such weight would have to be ascertained according to the practical usage of miners—feared, I say, that if the earlier part of the section remained unqualified the mineowner would be obliged to pay by weight, when so ascertained, for whatever might be contained
I in the tubs, baskets, or hutches."

LORD HALSBURY, therefore, thought, that, if the first part of the section stood alone, the mineowner would have to pay according to the weight as ascertained by the practical usage of miners, that is, for all that was in the tub, and he proceeds to say that the proviso was introduced to modify such a state of things. LORD BRAMWELL says (ibid. at p. 237):

"The effect of the enactment, then, is that the men must be paid by weight, that that weight is to be the weight of all they send up, but that from it may be deducted the weight of certain matters, provided that weight is ascertained in a certain way."

His meaning is perfectly clear, that from all that is in the tub there is to be deducted the weight of extraneous substances which are not the mineral contracted to be gotten, and that that must be done in a certain way according to the Act. LORD HERSCHELL says the same, and LORD MACNAGHTEN says (ibid. at p. 246):

"One thing is clear, that no deduction is permissible except what the Act specifies and allows. That being the law, if the agreement had stated in plain terms that a deduction was to be made from the wages of the miners in respect of slack—whatever form the deduction might have taken, whether the slack was to be absolutely rejected or paid for at a lower rate—no one, I think, could have doubted that that part of the agreement would have been in contravention of the Act of Parliament."

Those observations mean that the deduction must be made from weight, and in respect of the weight of extraneous substances. How can we here, in the face of those observations, hold that the judgment of GRANTHAM, J., in the court below was right in which he says that the deduction in this case was a deduction from wages, and that a deduction from wages is allowed by the Act. His judgment upon that point was wrong, and the judgment of CHARLES, J., was right, in which he says that weight only can be deducted, and that the miners are to be paid only for the coal in the tubs, but that, unless it is agreed that deductions are to be made in accordance with the proviso, the mineowner must pay in respect of the weight of everything which is in the tub. Looking at the agreement in this case for fines for dirt, the deductions are clearly made in the wrong way, and in a way which contravenes the Act. The miner is not to be paid for the coal which is left in the tub after the other stuff has been cleared out of it, and is to forfeit his wages for that tub if more than a specified amount of dirt has been sent up in it. That contract, as acted upon by the parties, shows that the deduction is illegal, because it is in contravention of the Act of Parliament. Such an agreement as this as to the mode of payment of wages is illegal by reason of the statute.

The agreement as to deductions being illegal, the question then arises whether that makes the whole contract illegal, and consequently destroys the stipulation as to fourteen days' notice. I take it that the rule as stated in MAXWELL ON STATUTES (2nd Edn.), p. 491, is properly enunciated and laid down. It is there stated thus:

"The question whether the whole instrument or only the invalid part is void depends on the more rational ground whether the vitiated part be severable from the rest or not. If the one cannot be severed from the other part the whole is void; but if it be severable, whether the illegality was created by statute or by the common law, the bad part may be rejected and the good retained. If a deed was made on a consideration, part of which was illegal, the whole instrument would be void, for every part of it would be affected by the illegal consideration; and a contract of which the consideration is in any part illegal cannot be enforced. But it would be otherwise if only some of the promises which constituted the consideration were illegal and the illegality did not taint the rest."

If the whole consideration is illegal, or if any part of the consideration is illegal, then every promise is illegal because every part of the consideration is the consideration for each promise, and if a part of the consideration is illegal, the promise is founded upon an illegal consideration and the whole is illegal. If, however, the consideration is lawful, there may be several promises or liabilities depending upon it, and if one is illegal it cannot be enforced because the promise is illegal and that promise is not supported by the consideration; but as to the other promises and liabilities in the same contract they are not illegal, and are supported by a lawful consideration. Each of these other promises is, therefore, good, and can be enforced. That is the rule of law. What was stated by LORD

A HALSBURY in Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne (1) is applicable to this case, viz., that the whole contract is not illegal, but that the deductions are not enforceable. What is the consideration in this contract? There is a consideration on both sides which is without blemish: on the one side there is the promise to employ, and on the other side the promise to enter into the employment; both of these are lawful considerations. In this case there is one illegal promise, and that promise consequently cannot be enforced. The other promises founded upon the same consideration are not illegal, and are supported by a good consideration. This promise, as to giving fourteen days' notice, is founded upon a good consideration, and can, therefore, be relied on and enforced, though the other promise as to deductions is illegal and cannot be enforced. I am of opinion that the judgment of CHARLES, J., was right, and that the stipulation as to deductions was illegal, but that the

B promise as to notice, which was relied on in these proceedings, was binding, and that the decision of the justices was right. This appeal must be dismissed.

C LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the judgment of CHARLES, J., was right. I think that the deductions agreed to in this case were not authorised by the Act of Parliament, and were, therefore, illegal. The

D contract, however, is only illegal in part, and that part is severable from the other parts.

The question whether these deductions are legal or illegal depends upon the true construction of s. 12 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. The meaning of that section is not clear and unambiguous. The first part of the section is as follows:

E “Where the amount of wages paid to any of the persons employed in a mine depends on the amount of mineral gotten by them, those persons shall be paid according to the actual weight gotten by them of the mineral contracted to be gotten, and the mineral gotten by them shall be truly weighed at a place as near to the pit mouth as is reasonably practicable.”

F Every provision of that part of the section refers to weight, and, in my opinion, means the weight of the whole of the stuff brought to the pit mouth in the tub. That construction makes the proviso easy to construe. The House of Lords in Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne (1) took that view.

The first part of the section, then, referring to the whole of the stuff brought to the surface, we come to the deductions provided for in the proviso, which says

G that

“nothing in this section shall preclude the owner . . . from agreeing with the persons employed in the mine that deductions shall be made in respect of stones or substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten, which shall be sent out of the mine with the mineral contracted to be gotten, or in respect of any tubs . . . being improperly filled in those cases where they are filled by the getter of the mineral or his drawer . . . such deductions being determined in such special mode as may be agreed upon between the owner and the persons employed in the mine.”

H

What are those deductions? It is clear that the deductions contemplated are in respect of weight. In respect of the weight of what? In respect of the weight of

I “stones and substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten.” In my view, the intention of the legislature was that the miner was, in any event, to be paid for the mineral gotten, but that the mineowner should be entitled to make certain deductions in weight from the tubs in respect of stones and other substances. I think that it is essential that, in any case, the miner shall be paid for all the coal sent up by him as distinguished from stones or other substances not coal. What has happened in this case? The mineowner and the miners have arranged thus: If a tub contains twenty-five pounds of dirt the miner is to be paid only for one half of the coal in the tub, and if the tub contains thirty-five pounds of dirt, then the whole weight of the tub is to be forfeited. Such an arrangement seems to me to contravene the provisions of s. 12, and is, I think, unlawful. A

With reference to the other point raised, it has been argued that an agreement containing this provision, which is illegal, is itself wholly illegal. The law is, in my opinion, clearly as follows. If any part of the consideration for a promise is illegal, the whole agreement is void. The reason for that rule is that in such a contract one cannot ascertain the weight of each part of the consideration, and, therefore, if any part of the consideration is unlawful, all the promises founded upon it must fail. When, however, there is no illegality in the consideration, and some of the promises are legal, but others are illegal, the illegality of those promises which are bad does not contaminate those promises which are good unless, owing to the form of the contract, they are so connected together as to be inseparable. Let us test this case by that rule. The consideration moving to the miners is employment and payment of wages, and the consideration moving to the employer is the promise to serve. Both of these are good and lawful considerations. Then there is this provision for deductions, which is, in my opinion, entirely independent of, and severable from, the provision as to notice. CHARLES, J., was, therefore, right in his judgment when he held that the one promise was separable from the other, that the consideration for the promise was good, and that the good separable promise could be given effect to, though the other promise was illegal and could not be given effect to. The decision of the Divisional Court was right, and this appeal must be dismissed. B C D

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This was a proceeding by the mineowner against the miner to recover damages under a contract. The contract was in this form: E

“I, the undersigned, in consideration of being employed at this colliery, do hereby agree to give to, and receive from, the Whitehaven Colliery Company fourteen days’ notice to terminate such employment, and, in the event of my leaving without giving such notice, to render myself liable to be proceeded against according to law. And I also further agree to the company making the undermentioned deductions from my wages, viz., fines for dirt.” F

The miner broke that contract by leaving the employment without giving notice, and these proceedings were taken. The justices held that the defence set up by the miner was no answer to the proceedings. The defence was that, by reason of the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, a stipulation in the contract as to deductions rendered the whole contract illegal, and that the contract could not be sued upon at all. G

What is it that the master has done in this case? That which has been done has been done for a long time; nineteen out of twenty tubs are not tested for dirt at all, and the whole weight of those nineteen is allowed; about one tub out of twenty is tested, which is selected at random; if there is more than twenty-five pounds of dirt in this tub one half of the weight is forfeited, and if there is more than thirty-five pounds then the whole weight is forfeited. I agree with the other members of the court that the House of Lords has put a construction upon this Act in Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne (1), which is, that a person employed in a mine is to be paid according to the weight of coal which he actually wins, but that by reason of the proviso the mineowner may make deductions, in respect of stones and other substances, from the weight of the stuff sent up in the tub. If it had been agreed that an average should be taken of the amount of dirt without weighing all the tubs, I do not think that any difficulty would have arisen under the statute. Here, however, the practice was to forfeit one-half or all of the weight of a tub if it contained a certain amount of dirt. How can it be said that that practice does not transgress the provisions of s. 12? In my judgment, it does transgress against the provisions of s. 12, and I have nothing more to say as to the illegality of this agreement. H I

Does that illegal part of the contract vitiate the whole contract? CHARLES, J., held that it did not, and I am of opinion that his reasons were well founded. The

A rule is that if the consideration is tainted with illegality, either wholly or in part, all the promises depending upon that consideration must fail; but that if the consideration is not tainted with illegality and there are several promises founded upon that consideration, and one promise is illegal, but others are not, there being a good consideration, the good promises will be upheld and enforced. That being the rule, take this case. What was the consideration moving from the master to the miner? The master was to employ the miner. The miner promised not to leave without giving notice, and that promise was not illegal. Looking at the contract the other way, it was that, in consideration of the miner serving, the master promised to pay wages. That was altogether a legal contract. Looking at it either way, then, it cannot be said that there was any illegality in the consideration. Both considerations were legal, and the promise depending thereon, which was illegal, cannot be enforced by either party, but the other promises which are good can be enforced. When, therefore, the miner breaks his promise as to giving notice, the master has a right to enforce it. The decision of the court below was right, and the appeal fails.

G Master and Servant—Duty of servant—During service—Abuse of confidential relationship—Compilation of table of specifications of articles made by master.

H In 1881 the defendant apprenticed himself to the plaintiffs, a firm of fire-engine makers, for a period of five years. After serving his apprenticeship he was employed by the plaintiffs as a draftsman until May, 1891, when he left their service. Two days before leaving the plaintiffs' service, the defendant, without their knowledge or authority, compiled a table of the dimensions of the various types of fire-engine made by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs sought an injunction to restrain the defendant from disclosing the contents of the table.

I Held: the compilation of the table was an abuse of the confidential relationship existing between the defendant and the plaintiffs, giving rise to a breach of an implied contract between them, and the injunction would be granted.

Motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant from publishing or communicating the contents of a table made by the defendant while employed by the plaintiffs, and to restrain the defendant companies from publishing or using the table. E

In 1881 the defendant, Edward J. Moore, apprenticed himself for the purpose of learning the business of mechanical engineering to the plaintiffs, a firm of fire-engine makers, for a period of five years. After having served his apprenticeship he was taken by the plaintiffs into their employ as a draftsman at a salary of 30s. a week. In May, 1891, the defendant left the plaintiffs' service, and entered the employment of the defendants, Mobbs & Co., Ltd., makers of machinery, and shortly afterwards that company, in conjunction with the defendants, the Sphincter Grip Armoured Hose Co., Ltd., commenced the business of fire-engine makers under the style of the Fire Appliances Co. From the evidence it appears that about two days before leaving the plaintiffs' employ the defendant, without their knowledge or authority, compiled a table of the various dimensions of the various types of fire engines made by the plaintiffs, which dimensions the plaintiffs claimed to be "trade secrets," and the plaintiffs stated their belief that these dimensions were taken for the purpose of being communicated to the defendant companies, inasmuch as those companies had recently exhibited in their shop for sale a fire engine of the same dimensions as those of one of the engines whose dimensions were given in the table in the defendant's possession. The plaintiffs then commenced this action, and now moved for an interim injunction to restrain the defendant from publishing or communicating to any person the paper or table of dimensions or the contents thereof, "which paper had been compiled by him in breach of his contract of employment with the plaintiffs, and in breach of the confidence reposed in him by the plaintiffs," and to restrain the defendant companies from publishing or using in the construction of fire engines, or otherwise in the course of their trade or business, the information so obtained from the plaintiffs by the defendant. The defendant said he prepared the table merely for his general information; that when he left the plaintiffs' service he placed the table with his engineering and mechanical text-books; that since he had been in the service of the defendant companies he had not been employed in designing or making drawings for fire engines for which the table, or any information therein, could be of the slightest use and he denied ever having shown it to his present employers. The managers of the defendant companies deposed that they had F

B KEKEWICH, J.—There is inconvenience in trying this question on motion, because some expression of opinion is inevitable, and the circumstances under which the case comes before me make that opinion unsatisfactory. There has been a conflict of evidence which requires to be submitted to the test of cross-examination, and there is no evidence as to the usual course of trade, or as to what is done in this particular trade. I shall deal differently with the case of the defendant Moore and with the case of the other defendants.

C What is the state of the law with respect to a gentleman who occupies the position of a clerk or servant in the employ of a professional man or tradesman? The law has been laid down in Tipping v. Clarke (1), Prince Albert v. Strange (2), and other cases which have been cited, and finally in a recent case before NORTH, J., which has not been cited, that of Pollard v. Photographic Co. (3), where his Lordship said (40 Ch.D. at p. 354):

D “It is quite clear that, independently of any question as to the right at law, the Court of Chancery always had an original and independent jurisdiction to prevent what that court considered and treated as a wrong, whether arising from a violation of an unquestionable right or from breach of contract or confidence.”

E It is sometimes difficult to say in any particular case whether the court proceeded on the ground of implied contract or of confidence. Perhaps the real solution is, that confidence postulates an implied contract. Where the court is satisfied of the existence of a confidential relation, it at once implies a contract arising from that confidential relation which calls for the exercise of the jurisdiction.

F Reuter's Telegram Co. v. Byron (4) (43 L.J.Ch. at p. 663) shows why an injunction is refused. There no restraint will be granted “in the absence of a contract express or implied.” There was no confidence in that case. This is the case of a gentleman who was formerly apprenticed to the plaintiffs. It is immaterial to consider whether he paid a fee for his apprenticeship, or what the terms of his articles were. His object was to learn his trade and to give his principals the benefit of such services as he could perform. No question now arises with regard to his duty during that apprenticeship; but after the expiration of his apprenticeship he was taken into the plaintiffs' employment as a paid clerk, and from that time forward his duty towards the plaintiffs was based upon a bargain made by him to give them his full time during office hours in exchange for a proper remuneration. It was all a matter of bargain. I cannot imply from that bargain any obligation on the part of the plaintiffs to instruct their clerk. If in the course of doing his work he was able to learn, that would be so much the better for him in the course of his employment, as giving him a claim to higher remuneration and a better position, and it would also be the better for him in future years; but I see no obligation upon the plaintiffs to instruct him or to give him their books or drawings to look over during his spare hours. It was simply a bargain that for a certain remuneration he should perform certain services. He, being then in that relation, thought fit within a few days of leaving the plaintiffs' service, and when he knew he was leaving, and when anything he did could be of no advantage to them, to draw out this table. It may be added this table was compiled from data at his disposal as clerk to the plaintiffs. It may be that with care all these details might have been obtained by inspection of the engines at hand or from worked drawings; but in this compendious form it was common ground that these materials did not exist, and the defendant thought it would be for his benefit that they should exist, and exist in his possession, and he must be taken to have intended to use them for his own purposes.

Was it lawful, was it right to do that? If he carried the figures in his head, no one could interfere with his use of them; but was not this an abuse of the confidence necessarily existing between himself and the plaintiffs, a confidence arising merely out of the fact of his employment, the confidence being that a servant should not use, except for the purposes of his service, those opportunities of service which were given him? The question appears to be one of some novelty; but I think that the abuse of the confidence was shown by the fact of this table having been compiled by the defendant within the last few days of his service, and of its having been compiled, therefore, when it could not be of any use to the plaintiffs. Where is it to stop if this is right? If the defendant was at liberty to do this, he could make extracts from working drawings as a whole or from any part, or he might take and carry away copies. It is difficult to draw the line and say that a clerk cannot do this or do that. It is impossible to lay down a rule applicable to all trades. The circumstances in different trades may vary. Take the case of a Bar student copying a conveyancer's precedents. In that case there is no contract certainly; but it is an unwritten law that the student may have the conveyancer's books of precedents not only for consultation, but for copying, and it is well known in the profession that not only with regard to conveyancing precedents, but also with regard to pleadings, these are of so much value that gentlemen go to particular chambers to follow that weary work of copying precedents. We all know what a long time LORD CAMPBELL spent in copying precedents in pleaders' chambers.

I think the present case is beyond the line. Accordingly the defendant will be restrained from publishing or communicating to any person this paper or the contents thereof. With regard to the other defendants, the companies, there is a good deal to be said; but the evidence displaces the plaintiffs' contention that those defendants must have made use of the paper, and counsel for the defendant companies has expressed his willingness that the order should contain an express disclaimer of any intention to make use of this paper for any purpose, and therefore an injunction ought not to be granted as against them. I say this on the ground that there was no threat or intention on their part to use the paper, and that there is no probability of their using it. A case may possibly be made out against them at the trial of the action, but I leave that for the present entirely open and free from comment. Their costs and the costs of the plaintiffs will be costs in the action, and the order will contain a statement that the defendant companies by their counsel disclaim any intention to publish or use this paper.

Shipping—Demurrage—Liability of charterers—Cargo to be loaded at two ports—First cargo damaged and shifting during voyage to second port—Need of re-stowing—Delay by stevedore—Servant of shipowners.

By a charterparty it was agreed that the ship should proceed to Leith and to London and there load cargo to be shipped by the charterers, and that a stevedore should be "appointed by the charterers in London only, but employed and paid for by owners." Cargo was loaded at Leith by the charterers, no information as to the London cargo being then asked for by the captain. On the voyage to London, owing to bad weather, some of the cargo was damaged and some was shifted. After the arrival of the vessel at London the captain found it necessary to land the damaged cargo to be re-conditioned, and to re-stow the cargo which had shifted. It was also necessary to shift some of the cargo to enable the London cargo to be properly stowed. Owing to these matters, and to some delay on the part of the stevedore who had been appointed under the terms of the charterparty, three days more than those allowed by the charterparty were occupied at London for loading. In an action by the shipowners against the charterers for demurrage,

Held: (i) the stevedore was the servant of the shipowners and the charterers were not liable for the delay occasioned by him; (ii) the shipowners were responsible for stowing the cargo and the charterers were not liable for the delay and expense brought about by the re-stowage; and (iii) the captain was not acting as agent for the charterers in re-stowing the cargo; and, therefore, the action failed.

Application by the defendants for judgment or for a new trial upon appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial before GRANTHAM, J., and a jury.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners of the steamship Dalbeattie, sued the defendants, who were the charterers of the ship, to recover a sum of £60 for three days'

demurrage, and also a sum of £28 8s. 4d. for expenses incurred in shifting some of the cargo. By a charterparty it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the steamship Dalbattie should proceed to a loading berth in Leith and Victoria Docks, London, and there load, and being loaded should proceed to five of certain named ports. The charterparty provided as follows:

"Stevedore to be appointed by the charterers in London only, but employed and paid for by owners at current rate. The cargo to be taken to and from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, but to be taken on board and discharged by the owners and at their expense. Ten clear working days are to be allowed the said charterers (if the ship is not sooner despatched) for loading, the day of departure not counting; and all working days on demurrage over and above the said laying days in port of loading to be paid for at the rate of £20 per working day. Lay days to commence on the steamer being placed at the charterers' disposal, with clean swept holds and with steam cranes and all other appliances ready for work, notice of which to be given to the charterers in writing. The charterers' liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped, except for freight due from charterers and any demurrage in loading, the owner having an absolute lien on the cargo for average and demurrage in discharging."

The charterers, as the owners knew, were putting up the ship as a general ship. The charterers shipped some cargo at Leith, the loading there occupying three working days. The captain did not then make any inquiries of the charterers as to the cargo to be loaded at London. The ship then proceeded to London, and on the voyage encountered bad weather. She arrived in the Victoria Docks, London, on Mar. 18, before 7 a.m., and the captain then gave the charterers notice that the ship was ready to load. On taking off the hatches, it was found that, owing to the bad weather, part of the cargo had shifted and part had been damaged. The captain had a survey made, and it was found to be necessary to land part of the cargo to be re-conditioned, and to re-stow some of the cargo which had shifted. It also became necessary to shift some of the cargo in order to enable the London cargo to be properly stowed. The charterers had at all times sufficient cargo alongside the ship to be loaded. Owing to the necessity of moving and re-stowing part of the cargo, and owing to some delay on the part of the stevedore, who had been appointed under the terms of the charterparty, the loading was not completed until Mar. 31.

The owners then brought this action to recover the sum of £60 for three days' demurrage in London, and also the sum of £28 8s. 4d. for expenses in shifting or removing part of the cargo at London.

At the trial the jury found, in answer to specific questions left to them, that (i) the ship was properly loaded at Leith as far as the stowage of the ship was concerned irrespective of convenience for loading other cargo at London; (ii) the captain was justified in loading her at Leith as he did with the information as to London cargo which he possessed or could have obtained, looking to the proper trim of the vessel for her voyage to London; (iii) the way in which the ship was loaded at Leith, irrespective of the shifting of the cargo in the storm, did not increase to any appreciable extent the time occupied in loading at London so as to increase the number of days for which demurrage could be charged; (iv) the loading in London was not delayed through the shifting of cargo in the storm; (v) half a day was a reasonable time for the stevedore in which to have unloaded and re-loaded Leith cargo that had shifted in the storm; (vi) looking at the various ports for which the cargo in London was to be consigned, the captain could not have loaded the cargo at Leith in such a way as to avoid unloading, in London, the whole or a considerable portion of the cargo that was put in Nos. 1 and 3 holds at Leith, irrespective of its having got shifted through the storm; (vii) the ship-owner did not by any act or default prevent the charterer from loading the ship within the stipulated lay days; (viii) the captain was not negligent in stowing the

A cargo at Leith. Upon further consideration the learned judge ordered judgment to be entered upon the findings for the plaintiffs for £88 8s. 4d. The defendants applied for judgment or for a new trial.

Cohen, Q.C., Newsom and Leck for the charterers.

Willes Chitty for the shipowners.

B LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the shipowners brought an action against the charterers to recover certain expenses, and also for three days' demurrage in London, and the question is whether there was any case upon which the judge could properly hold that the shipowners were entitled to recover either sum. The action is one between the shipowners and the charterers, and the rights of those two parties must be determined by the charterparty, and the case must be considered just as if no bills of lading had been given at all.

C The charterparty provides that the ship

“shall with all convenient speed proceed to a loading berth in Leith and Victoria Docks, London . . . and there load such lawful merchandise as the charterers may think proper to ship as will go down hatchways and stow, not exceeding 1,500 tons weight . . . and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to . . . and deliver the same as customary as fast as steamer can deliver, remaining always afloat.”

D There is the obligation of the shipowner, viz., to place the ship at the disposal of the charterers at two different places to be there loaded. What is the obligation created by the agreement “to be loaded?” Loading is a joint act of the shipper or charterer and of the shipowner; neither of them is to do it alone, but it is to be the joint act of both. What is the obligation on each of them in that matter? Each is to do his own part of the work, and to do whatever is reasonable to enable the other to do his part. This puts upon the shipper the obligation of bringing the cargo alongside the ship, and of doing a certain part of the loading. What is that part of the loading? By universal practice the shipper has to bring the cargo alongside so as to enable the shipowner to load the ship within the time stipulated by the charterparty, and to lift that cargo to the rail of the ship. It is then the duty of the shipowner to be ready to take such cargo on board and to stow it in the vessel. The stowage of the cargo is the sole act of the shipowner. What is a reasonable course of action for both parties? The shipper has all the lay days within which to bring his cargo to the ship, and, if he did not act reasonably, he might bring it all upon the last of those days; to do so would be unreasonable; he must act reasonably and bring the cargo alongside in sufficient time to enable the shipowner to do his part within the lay days. The shipowner must receive and stow the cargo reasonably as it is brought alongside.

E The shipowner, if no stevedore is to be employed by the terms of the contract, may employ a stevedore or not as he chooses; he may load the ship by his own officers, without the assistance of a stevedore, and stow the cargo in that way; if there is no obligation upon the shipper to employ a stevedore, the captain may, if he chooses, employ one, and, if he does, the stevedore is his servant, and he is liable for all his wrongful acts or conduct. Very often the charterparty contains a stipulation as to the employment of a stevedore. Sometimes it is stipulated that the charterer is to employ and pay a stevedore, and if he is to employ a stevedore to stow the cargo, then he is liable for the consequences of bad stowage. There is also another way in which the arrangement is made. The charterer may desire to have good stowage, but yet not to be under any obligation for the stevedore's actions; the charterer makes a contract with the shipowner or captain that the shipowner or captain shall employ a stevedore, to be appointed or nominated by the charterer. In such a case the shipper nominates a good stevedore, and then leaves him to be the servant of the shipowner, just as if he had been nominated by the shipowner.

What, then, does this contract say upon that matter? It says:

"Stevedore to be appointed by the charterers in London only, but employed and paid for by owners."

At Leith, therefore, this matter was left under the ordinary rule; but in London the stevedore was to be appointed by the charterers but employed and paid for by the owners. If the stevedore was to be appointed by the charterers and to be paid by the shipowner, then the stevedore would be the servant of the charterers; but I have no doubt that the words "employed and paid for by owners" were put into this contract for the very purpose of providing that the stevedore was to be deemed to be the servant of the shipowner. In this case, therefore, the stevedore who was to be appointed was to be the servant of the shipowner, but was to be nominated or appointed by the charterers. This, then, is a charterparty in a form which provides that the stevedore is to be the servant of the shipowner.

Then comes a clause which provides as follows :

"The cargo to be taken to and from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, but to be taken on board and discharged by the owners."

That imposes an obligation which would exist without any such clause. In this case the obligations of the two parties are, that the cargo is to be taken to the ship and lifted to the ship's rail by the charterers, and is then to be taken on board by the shipowner and then stowed by the shipowner when taken on board. There was this peculiarity about the cargo, that there were two ports of loading; and the ship was to be loaded in this way at each of those ports; the joint act of loading was to be done at each port; each party was bound to do that which might be reasonable at each port; and each party was bound to give reasonable information to the other if so requested. If the captain had, at Leith, asked for information from the charterers as to the cargo to be loaded at London, and the charterers could have given such information but did not do so, that would have been unreasonable conduct on their part, and the shipowners could, at all events, have recovered damages in an action against the charterers.

The shipowner, however, knew that cargo was to be loaded at London, and he knew pretty well what that cargo would be, and it was his duty to leave the ship in such a condition that the London cargo could be put on board at London, and for that purpose to ask for information from the charterers if he wanted any. If he did not ask for any information he took the risk. He might have asked for such information, and was entitled to get it, if the other party could reasonably give it. He did not ask, and, therefore, took the risk. When the ship came to London, he found out what the London cargo consisted of, and he had to arrange to take it on board, and for that purpose to re-arrange the Leith cargo. That is all a matter of stowage. The shipowner solely had undertaken that matter. He was to stow the cargo because the stevedore was his servant. If the charterers had cargo ready, and the shipowner was obliged to move the cargo, which was already on board, in order to stow the London cargo, that cannot impose any obligation on the charterers. If by so moving the cargo the shipowner was not ready to take on board the London cargo so as to do it within the lay days, that difficulty arose from the obligation which lay upon him, and which he failed in fulfilling. If the shipowner failed in fulfilling his part, but the charterers had cargo ready to be taken on board, the shipowner cannot charge the charterers for demurrage. All the delay was the delay of the shipowner, and the delay of the ship was his misfortune.

There is very strong evidence in this case that the stevedore at London took a longer time than was necessary to do his work in London, and the jury have in fact so found. It is impossible for the shipowner to charge the charterers for that. It is said that the charterers did not perform their part of the loading, and they had not cargo ready to be taken on board, and that the stevedore was delayed by that fact. That point was raised at the trial, and the evidence showed conclusively that there was always cargo ready to be taken on board, and the case must, therefore, be dealt with on the assumption that there was always sufficient cargo along-

A side the vessel. It is clear that there was default on the part of the stevedore at London, and it is beyond doubt that he was the stevedore of the shipowner. The claim for demurrage, therefore, cannot be sustained.

B As to the claim for expenses, if they were the expenses incurred in taking out the damaged cargo, there would have been a curious question raised. If that had been done in a case of necessity, the cesser clause would have had nothing to do with it. If not done in a case of necessity, the captain would not be the agent of the shippers unless he had consulted them and obtained their authority. In this case, if the charterers are treated as being the shippers, the captain could not be their agent of necessity at London, because they were at London and could be consulted. The captain could have told them that their goods were damaged, and have asked them to consider what ought to be done. The captain was not, there-
C fore, their agent here, and they cannot be charged with those expenses. If these expenses were the expenses of moving the cargo to make room for the London cargo, then they were expenses of stowage, and the charterers cannot be charged with them. The plaintiffs had no cause of action on either claim, and the learned judge at the trial ought to have directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendants. This appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendants.

Inn—Loss of guest's property—"Guest"—Temporary user of room engaged by other persons arriving later—Valuables and luggage left in unlocked room—Luggage later moved into corridor by innkeeper's servants—Negligence of guest—Loss exceeding £30—Burden of proof—Innkeepers' Liability Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict., c. 41), s. 1.

I

The plaintiff went to the defendants' hotel at an early hour in the morning, and asked for a bedroom. He was told that he could not have a room, as the hotel was full, but that there was a room, engaged by people who would arrive during the day, which he might use for the purpose of washing and dressing. He was shown up to this room, and his luggage (consisting of portmanteau, hat-box, and dressing-bag) were taken there. He washed and dressed in this room, opening his dressing-bag for that purpose, and taking out of it and placing on the dressing-table a dressing-case. He then went down to the coffee-room, had breakfast, paid for it, and went out, leaving his luggage in the room he had used, with the dressing-bag open and the dressing-case on the table. He did not return till late at night. In the meantime the persons who had engaged the room arrived, and the whole of the plaintiff's luggage was then placed in the corridor by the defendants' servants. When the plaintiff returned at night, he asked for his room, and was told he had none. Ultimately it was found that a room had been vacated since the morning, and the plaintiff's luggage was brought from the corridor and placed in it, the plaintiff's name being then entered for the first time in the guest-book of the hotel. The next morning the plaintiff discovered that jewellery had been stolen from an unlocked drawer in his dressing-case.

Held: assuming the relation of innkeeper and guest to have existed between the plaintiff and the defendants until the arrival of the other guests, the onus was upon the defendants to show that the loss occurred before the removal of the luggage to the corridor, and, consequently, through the plaintiff's negligence alone, which they had failed to do; but as to any loss exceeding £30, the onus was upon the plaintiff, under the Innkeepers' Liability Act, 1863, to show that it arose through the wilful act, default, or neglect, of the innkeeper or his servant, and, as the plaintiff had not shown that the loss occurred after the removal of the luggage to the corridor, he had not fulfilled that onus, and was not entitled to recover more than £30.

Notes. The Innkeepers' Liability Act, 1863, has been repealed and replaced by the Hotel Proprietors' Act, 1956, s. 2 (3) of which replaces s. 1 of the 1863 Act. The Act of 1956 increased the statutory limit to £50 for one article and £100 in the aggregate.

Appeal from the judgment of A. L. SMITH, J., on the trial of the action for damages for loss of goods from the defendants' hotel.

The plaintiff arrived at the defendants' hotel at 7 o'clock in the morning. He had with him three articles of luggage, namely, a portmanteau, a hat-box, and a dressing case bag. He asked for a bedroom, and was told that the hotel was full

A and that no bedroom was available, but there was one vacant room on the fourth floor which had been booked by a couple who were to arrive later in the day. The plaintiff was told that he could make use of this room for washing and dressing. He was shown to the room and his luggage was taken there by the hotel porter. There was posted up in the hall of the hotel a notice pursuant to the Innkeepers' Liability Act, 1863, and at the foot thereof in leaded type was printed:

B "For the safe custody of money and valuables visitors are requested to apply at the office. By order."

There was also hung up over the washing-stand in the room a printed table of charges and regulations, among which was as follows:

C "The proprietors will not be responsible for property lost in the hotel unless the same be deposited at the office and a receipt taken (see the Innkeepers' Liability Act, 1863, s. 1), and, as a matter of precaution, request that visitors will bolt and lock their room doors at night."

There was also pasted upon the inside of the door, just above the door-handle, the following notice:

D "Visitors are respectfully requested to lock and bolt their room doors at night."

There was a key in the lock of this door, with a label attached with the number of the room thereon, so that the door could be locked and the key taken had it been desired to do so. After arriving in the room, the plaintiff opened his dressing-case bag, and took thereout a stand and placed it on the dressing-table. This stand contained a large number of silver-mounted bottles, a flask with brandy in it, and also ivory brushes, combs, boot and button hooks, knives, scissors, and other implements supposed by some to be requisite for the proper performing of a toilet. In a drawer in this stand were the trinkets for the loss of which the action is brought. The plaintiff washed and dressed, and then went downstairs into the coffee-room, and had breakfast, having left the room unlocked, with the stand of his dressing-bag exposed upon the dressing-table as above described. He gave no information to anyone of what he had done. Having paid for his breakfast, which also included the accommodation he had had, he went out, and did not return to the hotel till late at night on the same day.

E In the meantime, namely, about 9 p.m., the couple for whom the room had been reserved arrived, and were shown up thereto by the page-boy of the hotel. Upon going into the room the page-boy found the plaintiff's luggage situated as already mentioned, and whistled down the tube to the head porter for directions. No evidence was given to show that the head porter or anyone else in the hall was aware of the way in which the plaintiff had left his dressing-bag and its stand, or of its contents. The page-boy, pursuant to the order of the head porter, removed the luggage into the corridor, and there left the stand as it was, the dressing-bag, and the other luggage. At about half-past twelve at night, the plaintiff having shortly before returned to the hotel, asked for his room, but was told that he had none. It was ascertained, however, that a room upon the first floor had been vacated, and this was given to the plaintiff. The plaintiff then entered his name in the guest-book, pursuant to the practice of the hotel when guests are received, and his luggage was brought down to the first floor from the corridor on the fourth. The next morning the plaintiff discovered that his trinkets had been stolen from the drawer of his dressing-bag stand, and the brandy in the flask was also partially abstracted.

I The plaintiff brought an action for damages against the innkeepers for £140, the total value of the stolen articles. A. L. SMITH, J., held that the plaintiff was not a guest at the hotel when the goods were stolen and that they were lost as a result of his own negligence. The plaintiff appealed.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The solution of this case will, to my mind, depend upon the inference of fact to be drawn from events as to which there is no doubt. There is no question here of the credibility of witnesses. We have the facts found by the learned judge, and we have to determine whether he has drawn the right inference from those facts. We are entitled to bring to bear on the facts our knowledge of the world, and I shall, therefore, bring to bear on this case my knowledge of the manner in which the business of hotels is conducted. A

The plaintiff, then, goes to an hotel in Liverpool. With what intention does he go there? Certainly not with the intention of making a contract. He goes there in the exercise of his right as one of the public to use the house as an hotel. An innkeeper does not make a specific contract with every individual who comes to his inn. He has no right to refuse anyone; and, in return for that obligation, he is given a lien on his guest's luggage for his charges. Of course he is not bound to take anyone if there is no room for him in the inn; in that case he can do nothing else but refuse to take him. In the present case, the plaintiff was told by the person left in authority for that purpose that they could not give him a room, that they had no room to give him; but, after reflection, the same person said that she could give him a room for the purpose of washing at that time, but that it was engaged by persons who were to arrive later. So it comes to this, that he was told that they could not give him a room to sleep in. Then his luggage is taken up to the room. The effect of what was said and done seems to me to be this: that he was to have a room in the hotel as a guest, but only for a time. Supposing that the people who were expected had not come, the manager of the hotel would never have thought of saying to the plaintiff that he could not have the room for the night. His things were there, and would have been allowed to remain there. There was a tacit understanding that his things were to be left in the room till the other people came. B C D E

Then was the relationship of innkeeper and guest established between the plaintiff and the defendants at any time? There certainly was such a relationship, to my mind, while he was actually using the room. What other relationship could it be at that time? But it was argued that the relationship only lasted while he was washing and dressing and then came to an end. That argument admits that the plaintiff was received as a guest into the hotel. It certainly is not the ordinary custom in hotels that a guest should carry his own luggage up or down the stairs. In this case the hotel servants carried his luggage up. If he ceased to be a guest when he had finished using the room, why did they not then carry his luggage down? It is said that he ought to have given them notice to do so. Why? If, the defendants knew, when the plaintiff applied for a room, that he could only have it for the purpose of washing and dressing, what need was there for him to give any notice? Supposing that to have been the understanding, it would have been the manager's duty in the ordinary course to have told the porter that the room was only given to the plaintiff to wash and dress in, and that, when he had washed and dressed, his things were to be fetched down. In that case, after the guest had had breakfast, if the things had not come down, the manager should have sent up for them. There was no new contract entered into with reference to the plaintiff's luggage after the plaintiff had left the room; nor, indeed, was there any contract made at any time, except such as necessarily arose out of the relationship of innkeeper and guest. The plaintiff was, therefore, a guest at all events up to the time when his things were taken out of the room. F G H

What is an innkeeper bound to do with respect to a guest's luggage? He is bound to keep it safely. If a guest's property is lost while it is in an inn, the innkeeper is prima facie liable. But the innkeeper can get rid of that prima facie case if he shows that the goods were lost by the negligence of the guest. The onus of proof of that is upon him. I think that in this case the defendants did prove that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in leaving his jewellery in an unlocked drawer of his dressing-case which he had taken out of his bag; and, if they had also proved that the goods were lost in the room, then they could have shown I

A that the goods were lost by the negligence of the plaintiff. But the defendants, through their servants, cut themselves off from the possibility of proving that by turning the things out into the corridor. What happened was, that the parties to whom the room was let arrived; that they are taken up to the room by a page-boy, who finds the plaintiff's things there; that he asks what to do with them, and is told by the head porter to put them out in the corridor; and that he puts B them out into the corridor just as they were, with the dressing-case outside the bag. There can be no doubt that this was gross negligence on the part of the porter and the page-boy. The defendants, therefore, could not prove that the things were lost while they were in the room. It is just as likely that they were lost in the corridor. The effect of their being stolen in the corridor and not in the room is, that the loss then is the result of the negligence of the defendants' servants in placing the things there, and not of the negligence of the plaintiff in leaving his things about. It is like the case of the donkey left carelessly in the road and run over when it could have been avoided. The fact that the plaintiff had been negligent did not entitle the defendants' servants to be negligent afterwards.

The matter, therefore, stands thus: The plaintiff has proved that the loss in D question was of property that he had at the hotel as a guest; the defendants have left it in doubt whether the loss occurred through the negligence of the plaintiff or through the negligence of their own servants; in order to escape liability they were bound to prove that the loss occurred through the negligence of the plaintiff; and the defendants are therefore liable, apart from the Act of Parliament which I am about to refer to, for the whole amount of the claim. The Innkeepers' E Liability Act, 1863, leaves the rights and obligations of the parties as they were before, but says that the plaintiff shall only recover £30, unless he can show that the loss arose through the wilful act, default, or neglect of the defendant or his servants. To get rid of that limitation of the defendant's liability the plaintiff has to prove that the loss has been the result of such wilful act, default, or neglect; and I think that he must prove that the loss was solely so caused, and that, if it F may have been caused partly by his own negligence, he fails to get rid of the limitation. In the present case I think that the plaintiff has not shown that the loss was caused solely by the wilful act, default, or neglect of the defendants' servants. If the goods were lost after they were placed in the corridor the loss was so caused; but the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that. As it is not proved whether the loss occurred in the room or in the corridor, and as, for this G purpose, the onus of proof is shifted, I think that the plaintiff has failed to get rid of the limitation of liability given to the defendants by the Act. In my opinion there ought to have been judgment for the plaintiff for £30.

BOWEN, L.J.—This case turns on inferences of fact, but it is an interesting case to a lawyer, because the result depends upon nice questions as to onus of H proof. In order to arrive at a correct conclusion, it is necessary to follow the shifting of that onus from the defendants to the plaintiff. The reason why we have to determine whether the relationship of innkeeper and guest existed between the defendants and the plaintiff is that, if the plaintiff can only rely on the negligence of the defendants as bailees, it is, of course, for him to prove his case; whereas, if he can bring himself within the relationship of landlord and guest, it I lies on the landlords to discharge themselves from liability.

There is no doubt that during the whole of the day on which the plaintiff arrived at the hotel his goods were on the premises, and that, in the course of that day, some of them disappeared. The difficulty in the case arises from the fact that, if the loss of the goods happened before they were removed by the defendants from the room where the plaintiff had left them to the corridor, there would then have been such negligence on the plaintiff's part causing the loss as would prevent him from recovering, notwithstanding the subsequent negligence of the defendants; if the loss happened after they were removed, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. We desire to know, therefore, whether the goods were lost before or after they were removed; but we are unable to ascertain this. Thereupon it becomes necessary to decide upon which of the parties the onus of proof rests. This depends, as I have said, upon whether the relationship of host and guest ever existed between them, and upon whether, if it ever existed, it ceased when the plaintiff left the hotel in the morning. If such a relationship never existed, or if it ceased in the morning, the plaintiff would have to show that the goods were lost after they were put out into the corridor, which he could not do, and his action would consequently fail.

In considering what was the relationship between the parties, you start with this, that a person who goes to an hotel has a right to the use of an unoccupied room. If a room is let to a guest who has not arrived, that is an unoccupied room. Until the room is actually wanted for the guest who has engaged it, it seems to me that the hotel-keeper is bound not to refuse accommodation at his house to any person applying for it. The hotel is not full until those who have engaged the rooms have arrived. The plaintiff, when he arrived at this hotel, was told by the manageress that the hotel was full, that he could not have a bedroom, but that there was a room then vacant, which was engaged by a lady and gentleman who were expected to arrive during that day, and that the plaintiff could then utilise it for the purpose of washing and dressing. I think that that meant that they could not guarantee the plaintiff a room beyond the time that the people who had engaged it should arrive, but that till those people arrived he might have it. The subsequent facts seem to bear out that view. His luggage was taken up to the room, and he went down to breakfast leaving his things there. No bill was made out for the use of the room. It is true that his name was not entered in the guest-book of the hotel; but that was because it was not certain that he would sleep there. Although it may have escaped their memory during the day, the hotel servants must have known at the time the plaintiff went out in the morning that his luggage had not been brought down. Counsel for the defendants argued that, at any rate, the plaintiff ceased to be a guest when he left the hotel in the morning. That, to my mind, is not a true proposition of law. I think that the relationship of host and guest continued until a reasonable time after a demand had been made for the room. I think, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict; but I think that he is only entitled to recover to the extent of £30, for the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls.

FRY, L.J.—On the questions that arise in this case as to the burden of proof, I agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls and BOWEN, L.J.; but, with regard to what is the true inference to be drawn from the facts, I differ from them, and agree with the learned judge who tried the case.

It is quite clear that, on arriving at the hotel, the plaintiff was told he could not have a bedroom. He was told by the manageress that the hotel was full, but that there was one room vacant which was engaged by a lady and gentleman who were expected to arrive during the day, and that the plaintiff could then utilise it for the purpose of washing and dressing. The plaintiff might, perhaps, have insisted on engaging the room for the day until the persons who had engaged it arrived. The usual thing is to engage a room for the night, and not for the day. However, I say nothing as to what his rights would have been if he had insisted on his right to engage the room for the day. But he did nothing of the kind. He was quite free to go to another hotel. He accepted the offer of a room to wash and dress in that was made by the manageress. He would require a portion of his luggage for the purpose of dressing; and, as it was obviously convenient that it should be kept together, it was all taken to the room. He occupies the room for the purpose for which it was offered, and then comes down to the coffee-room for breakfast. Having had his breakfast, he pays for it then and there. That is not the ordinary course for a person staying in the hotel. He does not receive the ticket which, according to ordinary usage, he would have received if he had been staying at the

A hotel. After breakfast he goes away. What ought the plaintiff to have done before he left, even if he had engaged the room till the other guests arrived? Knowing that they might arrive before his return, he ought to have made some provision as to the disposal of his luggage. We all know that the people of the hotel do not interfere with a guest's luggage till they are told that it is ready.

B I think, therefore, that the true inference from all the facts is, that the plaintiff occupied the room for the purpose of washing and dressing only. He could not, in my opinion, have been charged for anything more than that. It has been suggested that he was entitled to occupy the room till the arrival of the other guests. If he was entitled to make such an arrangement he did not do so. He did not even ask at what hour the other guests were expected to arrive. On these grounds, I think that the view taken by the learned judge below was correct.

In determining the rateability of a hereditament it must be capable of beneficial occupation. Whether the occupation is beneficial depends on whether it is of value to the occupier, not whether it is an occupation by which a profit can be earned. Accordingly, sewage and other public works are rateable although they do not produce any profit to the undertakers occupying them.

Sewers placed by a public authority under the land, the surface of which is occupied by other persons and in the ordinary course assessed to the poor rate has long been deemed to be free from rateability, but where an outfall sewer was carried in an earthen and concrete embankment, of an average height of 21 feet, on land belonging to the sewage authority, it was held to be undistinguishable from any other erection on land specially suitable for the purposes of the occupier, and, as such, was rateable.

Appeals from decisions of the Court of Appeal upon Special Cases stated by courts of quarter sessions. The appeals were argued separately, but they practically involved the same point, and only one judgment was given.

In the Erith Case the London County Council appealed against a poor rate made for the parish of Erith, in Kent, in which they were rated as owners and occupiers of sewage outfall works, a pumping station, and appurtenances used as part of the metropolitan system of sewage. In the West Ham Case the West Ham Churchwardens appealed against a decision of the Court of Appeal relating to the rateability of main sewers and a pumping station owned and occupied by the county council in the parish of West Ham. In the St. George's Case the St. George's Assessment Committee appealed against a decision of the Court of Appeal in I

A respect of the rateability of similar hereditaments owned and occupied by the county council.

F. Meadows White, Q.C., and Danckwerts for the assessment committee of St. George's Union.

C Sept. 8, 1893. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The London County Council, by whom the first of these appeals is presented, are the successors of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and owners of the outfall works, pumping station, and appurtenances, the rating of which is in question. The sewage south of the Thames is conveyed to Crossness, in the parish of Erith, and for the purpose of discharging it into the Thames the Metropolitan Board of Works purchased 37 acres of land and constructed upon it these outfall works, pumping station, and appurtenances. It was agreed

E “that if the land, outfall works, and pumping station in question were not in the possession of the appellants but in the hands of a private owner, and connected with the metropolitan sewage system, to be let to the appellants as tenants, they would be willing to pay a yearly rent for the same for the purpose of being used as part of, and in connection with, the metropolitan sewage system, sufficient to support the gross and net rateable value as fixed by the quarter sessions, as hereinbefore mentioned, but that except for the purposes of the metropolitan sewage system, and if the said works and premises were disconnected therefrom, and, in the hands of a tenant, applied to any other use or purpose they might be available for, the rateable value of the land and premises would be £2,678 gross and £2,143 net rateable value.”

The appellants contended :

G “That the said works, pumping station, and premises being only capable of beneficial occupation if used for other than the said sewage purposes should be rated at the value for which the same would let to a hypothetical tenant from year to year, supposing the said works, pumping station, and premises were not used as part of the said sewage system but were entirely disconnected therefrom and applied to any other use or purpose for which they could be made available, and that the appellants should be rated according to the rule laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham Overseers (2).”

The respondents contended :

I “That as the appellants would have been willing to pay a rent for the said works, pumping station, and premises if they had not been the owners, they must be taken into account as hypothetical tenants from year to year in order to ascertain the rateable value of the said premises, and that the rule as laid down in the Burton-upon-Trent Corpn. v. Egginton Churchwardens and Overseers (3) governs this case.”

The Queen's Bench Division gave judgment for the respondents, and this decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. No reasons were given in either Court, as the case was regarded as governed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Burton-upon-Trent Corpn. v. Egginton Churchwardens and Overseers (3).

In West Ham Churchwardens and Overseers v. London County Council, which is also before your Lordships for judgment, the question was whether the London County Council were liable to be rated, and, if so, on what basis in respect of a portion of the main sewers and of the pumping station situate in the parish of West Ham. So much of the outfall mains or sewers as are in that parish are constructed in an embankment on land purchased by the Metropolitan Board of Works, comprising about 37 acres. It was agreed that if the lands, sewers, pumping station, and works were in the hands of a private person, to be let to the county council as tenants, they would be willing to pay a sum sufficient to support the gross and rateable value, as determined by the quarter sessions; and that if the land, pumping station, and works were disconnected from the metropolitan sewage system, and in the hands of a tenant applied to any other use or purpose, the gross estimated rent of the land, pumping station, and works (exclusive of sewers) was £3,125, and the rateable value £2,500. The Divisional Court of Queen's Bench affirmed the order of the quarter sessions, but the Court of Appeal took a different view. The only question determined by the Court of Appeal was whether the sewers were rateable; whether the other works were rateable or not was withdrawn from their consideration. The Master of the Rolls thought the sewers were not rateable, because, unless it were the London County Council, no tenant could be found who could give any rent for them, and that the London County Council could not be the hypothetical tenant for two reasons: first, because they had no power to take the sewers on lease; and, secondly, because they must occupy them subject to the restriction that they could make nothing by them. FRY, L.J., thought that in order that a hereditament should be rateable three conditions must be fulfilled. First, there must be an occupier; secondly, a reasonable expectation of letting from year to year to a tenant; thirdly, a reasonable expectation of letting at a rent of the kind prescribed by the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836 [repealed by Local Government Act, 1948]. He came to the conclusion that there was no suggestion of any other hypothetical tenant than the London County Council, and that they were not persons who could be deemed hypothetical tenants, inasmuch as they could not become tenants of sewers. LOPES, L.J., said that if it had not been for R. v. London School Board (4), to which I will refer presently, he would have thought that, being occupiers under such statutory restrictions as those by which they are affected, and bearing in mind the fact that they must suffer a loss from their occupation, the London County Council were not the kind of hypothetical tenant contemplated by the statute.

In St. George's Assessment Committee v. London County Council, which also stands for judgment in your Lordships' House, the question raised by the Special Case was precisely the same as that raised in the Erith Case. It was found as a fact that if the London County Council had not been the owners of the lands, works, buildings, pumping station, and machinery they would have been willing to pay a rent for them sufficient to support the gross and net rateable value appearing in the valuation list. It was further found that if the lands, etc., were disconnected from the main drainage system and in the hands of a tenant who applied them to any other use or purpose for which they might be available, the gross value of the premises would be £1,577, and the rateable value £1,318. The London County Council contended before quarter sessions that they ought to be rated at this lower value according to the rule laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham Overseers (2). The respondents contended that the assessment should be at the higher value. The Queen's Bench Division followed the Erith Case, which they considered identical in its facts, and upheld the higher assessment. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision. They held that the case was governed by the West Ham Case decided by them, the effect of which I have just stated. In their view no distinction could be drawn between the rateability of sewers and that of lands and pumping stations, which were part of the sewerage system; that if the one subject were not rateable it followed the other was not rateable either. I can see no distinction between the facts of the Erith Case and those of the St. George's Case; they appear to me to be

A identical. The judgments of the Court of Appeal in the two cases are, therefore, in direct conflict.

The Erith Case was, as I have said, not argued, because it was supposed to be governed by the decision in the Burton-upon-Trent Case (3). The distinction drawn between the Burton-upon-Trent Case (3), which was argued, and the St. George's Case, and, as far as I can see, the only possible distinction, was that the court held that in the Burton-upon-Trent Case (3) the sewage authority could have become tenants of the land and pumping stations which they owned, but it was not, in the opinion of the court, within the power of the London County Council to become tenants of the land and pumping station which belonged to them. I shall have presently to consider the validity of this distinction, but before doing so it will be convenient to call attention to the decision arrived at by the Court of Queen's Bench in 1868 upon a statement of facts identical with that which came before the Court of Appeal in the Erith and St. George's Cases.

B I refer to R. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (5). Two points were raised in that case: first, whether the main sewers of the Metropolitan Board of Works were rateable; and, secondly, whether a pumping station and other premises belonging to them were rateable. The Court of Queen's Bench (consisting of C COCKBURN, C.J., and LUSH, HANNEN and HAYES, JJ.) held that the sewers were not rateable. With regard to the pumping station the court came to a different conclusion. They held that it was rateable, inasmuch as it had an occupation value. The learned judge who delivered the judgment of the court said (L.R. 4 Q.B. at p. 26) that the Board

E "must have rented such premises, if they had not become the owners of them, and a tenant might easily be found to take them if the Board were able and willing to let them. A distinction was attempted to be drawn in favour of the pumping apparatus, as being a necessary adjunct to the sewers, and it was contended that as the sewers are not rateable this adjunct must be exempted as being part of a non-rateable subject. But we cannot accede to this view. F The machinery stands on land which is valuable for occupation, and which would undoubtedly be rateable in the hands of any other occupier; and its rateable quality cannot be affected by the particular use to which it is applied by the Board."

G It may be that the actual judgment in the St. George's Case is not at variance with the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in R. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (5). The St. George's Case was so framed that if the court were of opinion that the then appellants ought to be rated according to the rule laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham Overseers (2) (to which I shall have presently to advert), and that the decision of the court of quarter sessions, holding that the London County Council were to be taken into account as possible hypothetical tenants, and that the case was governed by the principles laid down in the Burton-upon-Trent Case (3), was erroneous in law, H the order of the quarter sessions was to be quashed. The judgment in the St. George's Case merely quashed the order of quarter sessions; it was, therefore, right even though the pumping station were rateable unless it were, according to the contention of the parish, rateable on the basis that the London County Council were to be taken into account as possible hypothetical tenants. But the Court of Appeal distinctly rested their judgment on the ground that the pumping station was not rateable any more than the sewers, and that no distinction could be drawn between the two cases, while the Court of Queen's Bench, in R. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (5), no less emphatically drew such a distinction, and held the pumping station to be rateable and the sewers not. The Court of Appeal did not canvass the reasons adduced in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in R. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (5) for differentiating the two cases. The Master of the Rolls said that he was not in the least persuaded that the view I taken by the Court of Appeal differed from the view which LUSH, J., took. The other learned judges made no reference to the Queen's Bench judgment. A

I have said enough to show that the question of the rateability of these pumping stations is at present in a most unsatisfactory condition. I purpose confining myself in the first instance to the question of the rateability of these pumping stations, and to a consideration, if they be rateable, of the proper mode of assessing them, reserving for discussion at a later period the case of the sewers. The decision of this House in Jones v. Mersey Docks (6) marks an epoch in the law of rating. Many of the earlier decisions are tainted with the vice that they proceed upon the supposition that lands held for public purposes are on that account not rateable. The doctrine is now exploded, your Lordships' House having distinctly determined that the circumstance that land is held by a public body for public purposes does not affect its rateability. Much reliance was placed in the argument at the Bar in the present cases on the language used by BLACKBURN, J., in delivering the opinion of the judges in the Mersey Docks Case (6). The learned judge said (11 H.L.Cas. at p. 462): B C

"It is clear that there can be no valid rate unless the occupation be such as to be of value; and if the words 'beneficial occupation' are to be understood as merely signifying that the occupation is of value (which is obviously the sense in which the phrase is used in many of the cases cited at the Bar), it is clear that a beneficial occupation is essential as the foundation of the rate." D

The learned judge, in my opinion, did not and could not have meant that it is essential to rateability that a particular occupier of the land can make a pecuniary profit by the use to which he is putting it. It is, I think, rateable whenever its occupation is of value. At the time when the Metropolitan Board of Works purchased in the parish of Erith 37 acres of land for the purposes of their works the land was, of course, rateable. That it ceased to be so as soon as the Metropolitan Board of Works became the owners can scarcely be contended. For the purpose of discharging a duty imposed upon them by law they found it expedient to erect certain buildings upon the land and to connect them with sewers in other lands belonging to them. I am unable to see how this could produce the result that premises previously rateable ceased to be so. It is found as a fact, as I have already stated, that if the works were disconnected from the metropolitan sewage system and in the hands of a tenant applied to any other purpose for which they might be available their net rateable value would be £2,143. Suppose some other system of sewage were adopted and the pumping station were no longer applied to its present use, I do not think it could be doubted that the London County Council would be rateable in respect of it, and that its rateable value would be at least the sum thus fixed. If so, I cannot think that it is exempt from rateability, at the present time, on account of the particular use to which it is put by the owner, a use which it is clear might be abandoned at any time if it were thought expedient to do so. No obligation was imposed upon the Metropolitan Board of Works, and none is imposed on the London County Council, of maintaining in existence any particular sewage works. E F

So far I have dealt only with the question of rateability; upon what principle the assessment ought to be made, and what considerations are proper to be taken into account, are questions which, to my mind, are involved in much greater difficulty. In Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham Overseers (2) which came before the Court of Queen's Bench in 1870, the question was raised on what principle the Metropolitan Board of Works were to be assessed in respect of a pumping station. It was held that they were to be assessed upon the basis of the rent which would be paid by a hypothetical tenant from year to year, supposing the pumping station were not used for the purpose of main drainage, but was entirely disconnected therefrom, and applied to any other use or purpose for which it could be made available by a tenant. It was admitted by the learned counsel who appeared in that case for the respondents that the Metropolitan Board of Works G H I

A were rateable upon the basis adopted by the court. Before the quarter sessions, the parish had contended that the proper principle to apply in rating property was to treat it as if belonging to and constructed by a private owner, and in his hands to be let to the Board as yearly tenants; but this contention appears to have been abandoned before the Court of Queen's Bench.

B The suggestion that a public body who, in discharge of the duties imposed on them by law, have become the owners of land and buildings thereon might be themselves taken into account as possible tenants, was, so far as I am aware, first insisted on in R. v. London School Board (4). The Court of Appeal held that, in determining what was the rateable value of a school board building, the school board might be regarded as possible tenants, and what they would have been willing, had they not been owners, to have paid as rent for the premises might be taken into consideration. The arguments urged at your Lordships' Bar in the present case render it necessary to review this decision, and to determine whether it was sound in point of law. The rule which is to govern the assessment of premises to the poor rate was laid down by the legislature in the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836, s. 1, which provides that

D "No rate for the relief of the poor . . . shall be allowed by any justices, or be of any force, which shall not be made upon an estimate of the net annual value of the hereditaments rated thereunto; that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenants' rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rentcharge, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent. . . ."

E In the Act to provide for uniformity in the assessment of rateable property in the metropolis [the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, s. 4], the term "gross value" is defined as

F "the annual rent which a tenant might reasonably be expected, taking one year with another, to pay for an hereditament, if the tenant undertook to pay all usual tenant's rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rentcharge, if any, and if the landlord undertook to bear the cost of the repairs and insurance, and the other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the hereditament in a state to command that rent."

G The term "rateable value" is defined as meaning

"the gross value after deducting therefrom the probable annual average cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses as aforesaid."

H So far as the question to be determined in this case is concerned, I do not think the terms of the Act of 1869 are important. "The annual rent which a tenant might reasonably be expected, taking one year with another, to pay for an hereditament" is the same thing as "the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year."

I It has never been doubted that the rent which is actually being paid by the occupier does not necessarily indicate what is the rent which a tenant might reasonably be expected to pay, or that an owner who is in occupation, and may not be willing to let on any terms, is none the less rateable. The tenant described by the statute has always been spoken of by the court as "the hypothetical tenant." Whether the premises are in the occupation of the owner or not, the question to be answered is: Supposing they were vacant and to let, what rent might reasonably be expected to be obtained for them?

So far there can, I think, be no difference of opinion. But then arises the question: Is the owner to be regarded as one of the possible tenants in considering what rent might reasonably be expected? Bearing in mind what was the object of the legislature in prescribing this test of annual value, I cannot myself entertain any doubt that the owner ought to be thus taken into account. I entirely concur in the decision arrived at by the Court of Appeal in R. v. London School Board (4). A I think the circumstances of that case when examined are cogent to support the view which there obtained acceptance. If the school board were to hire buildings for the purpose of establishing a school, it could not be contested that these buildings would be rateable, and that the rent which the school board paid would be a most important element in determining the sum at which they were to be assessed.

 If, instead of hiring school buildings, they erect upon land similarly situate like B buildings, or if they were to buy the reversion of the buildings they hired, and so became the owners, why in either of these cases should the assessment be different? The premises are to them in all these cases of the same value and their occupation is equally beneficial, so why should the sum at which they are to be assessed to the relief of the poor differ? Again, suppose premises of occupation value for agricultural purposes were to be adapted by the owner for use in connec- C tion with the manufacture of some article under a patent process, which he alone was licensed to use; and that in their then condition no person would be willing to take them, would the premises cease to be rateable or be assessable only at a nominal sum, although they might be much more valuable to the owner, and their occupation much more beneficial than if they had remained fit for agriculture, and in a condition to be readily let for that purpose? I cannot think so. These are D illustrations. Many others might be adduced pointing in the same direction, and, to my mind, conclusively showing that the object of the legislature in enacting the provisions of the statute of 1836, to which I have referred, would be defeated if the question what the owner would have given if the premises had been to let and he had been free to take them were discarded from consideration.

The decision arrived at in the School Board Case (4) was followed in the Burton- E upon-Trent Case (3), which related to a pumping station in connection with a sewage farm. In Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Llanellian Overseers (1), which was earlier than either of these cases, language was used by some of the learned judges which it is not easy to reconcile with the decision in the Burton- upon-Trent Case (3), and, indeed, I am not sure that the decisions in the two cases are altogether consistent. In the Mersey Docks Case (1) the question to be decided F was the rateability of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and the principle upon which they were to be assessed in respect of a lighthouse, telegraph station, buildings, and lands within the parish of Llanellian. By the Mersey Docks Act certain lighthouses theretofore erected, and also a system of telegraphs established for the information and benefit of shipping entering the port of Liverpool, became vested in the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, to be maintained and worked by G them. The lighthouse in question was one of those which had been previously maintained by the trustees of the Liverpool Docks, and the lease of which for a term expiring in 1863 became vested in the appellants on their incorporation. The appellants afterwards purchased the freehold of the site of the lighthouse and some adjoining land, and spent a considerable sum in structural improvements of the lighthouse. The Master of the Rolls came to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, H that under the statutes regulating the matter the Conservancy receipts applicable to the maintenance of the lighthouse could never exceed the Conservancy expenditure, and he came, as a consequence, to the conclusion that the hypothetical tenant must rent them subject to the Acts of Parliament, and that, therefore, it would be a profitless occupation inasmuch as no person who received the earnings could make any profit therefrom. He, therefore, thought the lighthouse had no beneficial I value, and that there could be no beneficial occupation. He said (14 Q.B.D. at
 p. 786):

"That occupation was, to repeat the phrase we used a short time ago, struck with sterility by the Acts of Parliament."

The phrase to which the Master of the Rolls referred was made use of in West
Bromwich School Board v. West Bromwich Overseers (7). In that case the question of the rateability of a school board in respect of a public elementary school

A belonging to them was raised for the first time. Expressions were used by some of the learned judges which do not seem to me to be quite in harmony with the views arrived at on more mature consideration of the matter in R. v. London School Board (4). There is, however, no conflict between the two decisions, inasmuch as the school board was held rateable. BOWEN, L.J., said (13 Q.B.D. at pp. 942, 943):

B "I will assume that in the hands of the school board [the schoolhouse in question] is not capable of being beneficially occupied; but we must consider whether it is capable of being beneficially occupied in the hands of any other person. If land is by law struck with sterility when in any and everybody's hands so that no profit can be derived from the occupation of it, it cannot be rated to the relief of the poor. But if the schoolhouse is not used by this

C school board for any profitable purpose, it by no means follows that the site of it must be sterile in every other person's hands."

If land is "struck with sterility in any and everybody's hands," whether by law or by its inherent condition, so that its occupation is and would be of no value to anyone, I should quite agree that it cannot be rated to the relief of the poor. But

D I must demur to the view that the question whether profit (by which I understand is meant pecuniary profit) can be derived from the occupation by the occupier is a criterion which determines whether the premises are rateable, and at what amount they should be assessed, and I do not think that a building in the hands of a school board is incapable of being beneficially occupied by them, and is not so occupied because they are prohibited from deriving pecuniary profit from its use.

E FRY, L.J., in R. v. London School Board (4), said (17 Q.B.D. at p. 742):

"The term 'sterility' has been introduced into the cases because as a general rule a profit is produced, but it does not by any means follow that because there is no profit there is no value. There could be no better illustration of this than in the present case."

F I think the learned judge here points to the true test—whether the occupation be such as to be of value. This is the language used by LORD BLACKBURN, and I have already said that the possibility of making a pecuniary profit is not, in my opinion, the test whether the occupation is of value. As Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Llanelliian Overseers (1) was much relied on by the counsel for the London County Council I feel bound to say that I cannot agree with the view there adopted—that, because no pecuniary profit could be derived from the conservancy dues to which the board were entitled in respect of their lighthouse, its occupation was not a beneficial occupation, and had no pecuniary value, or that it was in any sense which could exempt it from rateability "struck with sterility." It appears that the lighthouse had at one time actually been held by the board as tenants. During

G that period its rateability could hardly be in question. Did the board become less rateable or assessable on any different basis because they ceased to be tenants and became the owners? The lighthouse, as it appears to me, was of value to the dock board, inasmuch as it assisted to protect from danger vessels which might use their docks and pay them dock dues.

I think some confusion has arisen from regarding the term "beneficial occupation" as meaning the same thing as an occupation by which a profit could be earned. As was pointed out by the Court of Queen's Bench in Bristol Governors of the Poor v. Wait (8), this is not its meaning when used as a test of rateability. The governors of the poor of Bristol had taken certain property outside the limits of their city for the purpose of putting out their poor, either simply to lodge them or to employ them at their discretion. In holding the governors rateable LORD DENMAN, C.J., in delivering the considered judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, said (5 Ad. & El. at pp. 7, 8):

"The absence of 'beneficial occupation' was also much insisted upon, and it was contended that that is the true criterion to ascertain whether property be rateable or not. It is not to be denied but that this phrase 'beneficial occupation' has been in frequent use, and, generally speaking, it serves tolerably well to convey rather a popular notion than to give a certain rule for deciding the question of rateability in every instance. Because, if by beneficial be meant profitable, or anything like it, the expression is obviously fallacious."

There is no doubt a certain class of cases in which the amount of profit which can be earned by the occupation of a hereditament is very material in ascertaining the sum at which it should be assessed. In the case of gasworks, waterworks, and other industrial undertakings, where a hereditament is enhanced in value by its connection with a profit-bearing undertaking, the profits earned and the share of those profits attributable to any particular hereditament have to be taken into account, and in such cases as these any restrictions which the law has imposed upon the profit-earning capacity of the undertaking must, of course, be considered. But I do not think this class of cases affords any guide to the assessment of such hereditaments as those with regard to which your Lordships have now to lay down the proper principle of rating.

Owing to a statement made in the course of the argument at the Bar, I wish, in order to avoid possible misconception, to add a few words as to the method which ought to be followed when it is manifest that an owner would be willing to pay a higher rent than could be obtained from any other tenant. It was said that a practice prevails of taking 5 per cent. on the cost in the case of buildings as a basis for arriving at the rental. Such a rule of thumb may be all very well where the premises would be likely to find competing tenants, but it is not by any means necessarily applicable where it is thought that the owner would be likely to give a higher rental than anyone else. It would often be obvious that he would never be willing to pay the rent arrived at in such a fashion, inasmuch as it would be more advantageous for him to become the owner. There are many other circumstances, too, which may affect the answer to the question what the owner of premises would have been willing to give if instead of becoming the owner he had become the tenant of them. In all cases of the description of which I am speaking the whole of the circumstances and conditions under which the owner has become the occupier must be taken into consideration, and no higher rent must be fixed as the basis of assessment than that which is believed the owner would really be willing to pay for the occupation of the premises.

Having given my reasons for thinking that the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the Burton-upon-Trent Case (3) was correct, and that the principles there laid down are in accordance with the law, I turn now to the point which it was thought differentiated the St. George's Case from the Burton-upon-Trent Case (3)—namely, that neither the Metropolitan Board of Works nor the London County Council could, under the statutes which gave them their powers, have become tenants of the pumping stations, of which they were and are the owners. The point was first glanced at in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in R. v. London School Board (4). The learned judge said (17 Q.B.D. at p. 740):

"If, by the terms of any statute, it [the School Board] could not legally be tenant it would be excluded from the calculation."

The view thus suggested was adopted by the Court of Appeal as the ground of their decision in Owens College v. Chorlton-upon-Medlock Overseers (9). The appellants were the governors of Owens College. The property rated consisted of land purchased by them for the college and college buildings erected and provided by them under the Owens College Act, 1870. The governors were empowered to acquire and hold land as a site for the college, and other land not exceeding 200 acres. They were also empowered to grant leases of the lands vested in them, except the site of the college. The college could not be carried on as a collegiate institution at a profit in a commercial sense. The lands had been purchased at an expense of £25,000 and upwards, and the buildings had cost more than £125,000. The respondents had assessed the governors of the college at a rateable value of

A £3,285. The Case Stated found that, if let for any purposes to which (without considerable structural alterations) they were capable of being turned, they would not let for more than £1,300 per annum gross rental.

Upon the basis of a rateable value thus arrived at, the college authorities were willing to be assessed. The Master of the Rolls said that, if the college could be considered as possible tenants, that valuation would be wrong. The test for the determination of the Case seemed to him to be whether they could legally be tenants of the site for the purposes of the Act, for if, said the learned judge (18 Q.B.D. at p. 407),

“they could not, can it be right to say that what they would give for rent should be taken into account.”

C After giving his reasons for thinking that the site which the governors were authorised to take was what they were to acquire as owners in fee simple, the learned judge proceeded (ibid.):

“If so, it appears to follow that they ought not to be taken into consideration as hypothetical tenants. Can it be supposed that the governors are seeking to become tenants of a site when the Act of Parliament says they cannot be tenants? It seems to me that the proposition involves the answer to it.”

D The other learned judges concurred in this view. BOWEN, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 409):

“It seems to me that they ought to be excluded from the class of persons who might reasonably be expected to give a rent for the premises, because they cannot, as matters stand, ever become tenants of the premises for the purposes of a site for the college; a fetter is already imposed upon them, and they can never now hold the premises except as owners in fee simple.”

E FREY, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 411):

“It seems to me that the result is that the land is dedicated for ever as the site of a building for the college, and that the appellants are incapable of hiring that land for the purposes of the college, and therefore that the contention is well founded that, being prohibited from hiring the land, they cannot be taken into consideration as possible tenants.”

F I have stated fully the reasons which led the learned judges to the conclusion that the governors of Owens College were to be left out of account as possible tenants when determining the annual value of the premises occupied by them; and I have most carefully considered these reasons with all the respect which is justly due to the views of the learned judges who concurred in them; but I am unable to share the opinion which they expressed. The conclusion arrived at is in its result sufficiently startling. Two public bodies might have erected buildings similar in all respects upon land similar in situation and of equal value; and these buildings might be occupied in the same way and applied to the same purposes; and yet, if one of these bodies had power, under the statute constituting it, to hire such buildings, and the other had no such power, the rateable value of the buildings might, and almost certainly would, be different; that is to say, the buildings would have a different annual value, for the words in the statute of 1836, which followed the expression “annual value,” only provide a means of arriving at what is the annual value of the premises. Why should the annual or the rateable value of the premises for the purposes of the poor law depend upon the statutory power of the owner to take them supposing he had not been the owner? I am unable to discover any satisfactory reason for this difference, and none seems to me to be suggested by the judgments in the Owens College Case (9).

I I do not think the distinction drawn can be confined to premises belonging to and occupied by public bodies for public purposes. A private individual might receive money under an obligation to erect with it a building upon a particular site to be occupied by him during his lifetime, and with a prohibition against letting to anyone else. If the principle adopted in the Owens College Case (9) be a sound one, such an owner would, I presume, be equally excluded from consideration. No attempt was made to show that it was reasonable or just that the distinction drawn in that case should affect the rateability of premises, or their assessment to the poor rate; it appears to have been thought a necessary consequence of the application to such a case of the rule for the assessment of property laid down by the statute of 1836. No doubt, if this were so, the conclusion reached was a right one, however unsatisfactory or even unjust it might be, that the rateability or assessment of premises in other respects similar, and occupied for similar purposes, should depend upon whether the owner could have taken the premises which he occupied as tenant or was only enabled to become the owner of them.

But having regard to the language used in the statute, and the construction which has been put upon it, I do not myself feel the difficulty by which the Court of Appeal seem to have been pressed. An owner who is in occupation of premises can, of course, never reasonably be expected to take them as tenant from year to year—he cannot become tenant to himself. Yet it has been held that the rent which, if the property were in other hands, he would be willing to pay may be taken into account when inquiring what is its annual value—that is, at what sum it might reasonably be expected to let from year to year. If the hypothesis be admissible that the owner might himself be among the possible tenants, although, as a matter of fact, he could not be so, it seems to me no more violent hypothesis to conceive him as among the possible tenants, even although he may be subject to certain legal restrictions which would prevent his becoming so. Having regard to the scope and object of the enactment in the statute of 1836, I can see no sufficient reason why, if in the one case he may be regarded as the hypothetical tenant, he may not equally be so regarded in the other. It seems to me that a contrary conclusion ought not to be arrived at unless the provisions of the statute inexorably require it.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment in the St. George's Case cannot be supported, even on the assumption that the Court of Appeal rightly held that the London County Council were only empowered to become the owners, and could not, in fact, have become the tenants of the pumping stations in question. It follows that, in my opinion, the judgment in London County Council v. Erith Churchwardens ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs, while in St. George's Assessment Committee v. London County Council the judgment must be reversed, with the usual consequence as to costs.

I now turn to the separate case of the rateability of the main outfall sewers in the parish of West Ham. But before dealing with the particular facts relating to the main sewers in that parish, I desire to consider the case generally of the main sewers formerly vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, and now in the London County Council. It was held, in R. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (5), as I have said, that the sewers were not rateable. The ground of the decision was thus put by LUSH, J., who delivered the judgment of the court (L.R. 4 Q.B. at p. 26):

“We are of opinion that they are not rateable, on the short ground that they are not at present the subject of a beneficial occupation. No payment is made to the board for the use of them; the rates which they are empowered to levy are for the expense of construction and maintenance, and nothing more. Their occupation yields no profit to the board, as occupiers, either actual or potential.”

The effect of this decision was not to establish an exemption of property which down to that time had been rated. By s. 135 [repealed by Public Health (London) Act, 1936] of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the main sewers then vested in the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London and in the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers were vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, and there was at the same time conferred on them the power to construct other sewage

A works to prevent the sewage within the metropolis passing into the river Thames near the metropolis.

The Case Stated by the court of quarter sessions in R. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (5) found, as a fact, that neither the late Commissioners of Sewers nor the Metropolitan Board of Works had ever been rated to the relief of the poor in respect of the sewers. It appears, therefore, that for a very long period, both B before and since the decision in R. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (5), this particular subject has not been treated as rateable. I cannot regard as altogether satisfactory, in view of the fuller consideration which has since been given to the matter, the grounds upon which the Court of Queen's Bench rested the non-rateability of these sewers; the judgment seems to assume that there can only be a beneficial occupation where it is such as to yield a profit to the public body C occupying the premises. I have already said that, in my opinion, the true test is whether the occupation is of value, and not whether it is one by which pecuniary profit can be made. But it would undoubtedly be a serious matter that a hereditament which has for so long a period been deemed free from rateability should now, for the first time, be subjected to it. And there is this peculiarity about the particular subject with which I am dealing—until the sewer was made no rateable D subject-matter existed where the sewer now is. If its use as a sewer were abandoned its rateability would cease, for it is obvious that no person would be willing to take it at any rent. It is not like the case of land previously rateable which has been adapted to purposes different from those for which it was previously employed, and whose rateable character would not on that account be affected. I cannot pretend that the law of rating is at present in a satisfactory condition, or E that, by the application of well-settled principles, the rateability of public bodies in respect of property such as that with which your Lordships are dealing can be rested upon a sound and consistent basis.

In Sheffield United Gas Light Co. v. Sheffield Overseers (10), BLACKBURN, J., after quoting the observation of WIGHTMAN, J., in R. v. West Middlesex Waterworks (11), that there appeared so much difficulty in satisfactorily applying the F parochial principle of rating by estimating the rent which a tenant would give for the subject-matter in such a case as that before him, as practically to amount nearly, if not entirely, to an impossibility of doing so satisfactorily, and after stating that the whole subject-matter appeared to be involved in so much difficulty and uncertainty that the court had taken much time in considering whether they could not place the rules as to the rating of these companies on more intelligible G and satisfactory principles, capable of uniform application, added (4 B. & S. at p. 146):

“We have not, however, succeeded in laying down a rule which would be consistent with the existing legislation and decisions on this subject, and would at the same time be capable of being satisfactorily worked; and we are strongly H impressed with the importance of not unsettling the law as established by past decisions, where we cannot lay down a rule which is not open to exception. On the whole, therefore, we feel that our only course, until the legislature shall think fit to interfere, is to adhere to the case of R. v. West Middlesex Waterworks Co. (11).”

I entirely concur with the learned judge in deeming it inexpedient to interfere I in such a matter as this with a long course of practice supported by decisions which are not of very recent date. Therefore, even if it be not possible to rest upon grounds altogether satisfactory the exemption of these sewers, yet the case being, as I have said, a very peculiar one, I could not advise your Lordships to depart from a practice which has prevailed for a very long period, and has been sanctioned by judicial authority.

So far, I have referred to the case of sewers under land, the surface of which was occupied by other persons, and in ordinary course assessed to the poor rate. But the particular case of the outfall sewer in West Ham is an exceptional one; that sewer is not constructed underground. Thirty-seven acres of land were purchased by the Metropolitan Board of Works for the purpose of this portion of the outfall sewer. The land so purchased had down to the time of its purchase been assessed to the poor rate. The sewer is carried in an earthen and concrete embankment erected upon the land at an average height of twenty-one feet above the general surface of the land adjoining. The work thus constructed, therefore, differed from the mere creation of a sewer below the surface of land which continued afterwards, as before, liable to assessment, but was an adaptation to the purposes of the board of land already occupied and rated. I confess I see the utmost difficulty in distinguishing such an erection as this upon the surface of land from any other erection specially suitable for the purposes of a particular occupier, which might render it of less value for occupation by other persons not requiring it for that special purpose. And if in general owners who occupy land in order to discharge a duty imposed on them by statute may be regarded as among the hypothetical tenants, I cannot find any sound basis on which to rest a distinction in favour of the Metropolitan Board of Works or their successors, the London County Council, in respect of this particular use of the land which they own.

It was, I am aware, held by the Court of Queen's Bench in the year 1870 that there was no distinction, for rating purposes, between a sewer underground and one carried upon an embankment, but I have already stated to your Lordships the only ground on which the exemption of the sewers generally can, in my judgment, be rested, and I have pointed out the distinction which exists between an underground sewer and an adaptation of land already rateable to a particular purpose. LUSH, J., stated that the rateable quality of land was not to be determined by what it once was, or by what it might thereafter become, but by what it was at the time the rate was made. I quite agree with this, but if it be the law that the owner of a hereditament may be regarded as among the hypothetical tenants, that rule would seem as applicable to the particular erection, whose rateability is the matter in question, as to any other. For these reasons, I am of opinion that, even if the sewers are in general exempt from rateability, the particular sewer work in the parish of West Ham cannot be so treated, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal must, therefore, be reversed, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division restored, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON, LORD ASHBOURNE, LORD MACNAGHTEN, and LORD MORRIS concurred, LORD ASHBOURNE stating that he had only been present at the argument of the first case, and that his opinion was, therefore, confined to that case.

Re RICHERSON. SCALES v. HEYHOE (No. 2)

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Chitty, J.), June 13, 14, 1893]

B Administration of Estates—Administration action—Legal personal representative of deceased person interested under will—Proceedings in absence of representative—Order dispensing with representative—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 46—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 6.

An order was made on a summons in administration proceedings in the absence of S.J.S. who, as personal representative of a deceased person, had an interest in the matter disposed of adverse to that of the parties appearing on the summons. Correspondence had previously taken place between the solicitors of S.J.S. and those of the trustees who issued the summons, and, though she had not been made a party, a copy of the order had been served on her solicitors. S.J.S. now asked for a declaration that she was not adversely bound by the order.

D Held: (i) under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 46, it was necessary, to render an order of the court binding on the estate of a deceased person, that it should appear on the face of the order either that the court, having had its attention called to the point, had decided to proceed in the absence of the legal personal representative of the deceased's estate, or had appointed some person to represent it; accordingly, as the order should have been drawn up either dispensing with the representative or appointing some person to represent the estate, S.J.S. was not bound by it: (ii) this rule was not affected by reason that where the court did not require other parties to be served with the summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 6, there was no necessity for expressing that on the face of the order.

G Action in the administration of the estate of the testator by the plaintiff against the trustees of the will and the representatives of William Scales for (inter alia) a declaration that any part of an order of Aug. 11, 1890, made on a summons in chambers, which was detrimental to her interest, either in her own right or as representing the estate of Sarah Scales, was not binding on her.

By his will, dated July 15, 1863, the testator, John Richerson, gave all his residuary personal estate to trustees on trust to pay one moiety of the annual dividends or interest thereof to his nephew, William Scales, for life, and the other moiety of such dividends or interest to his niece, Susan Scales, for life, and in case William Scales or Susan Scales should leave any lawful issue him or her surviving, then the testator directed that all such residuary personal estate should after the decease of the survivor of William Scales and Susan Scales, be equally divided between such lawful issue in equal shares; but in case neither of them should leave any lawful issue him or her surviving, then the testator directed that all such residuary personal estate should be equally divided between all his next-of-kin that might be living at the decease of the survivor of William Scales and Susan Scales, according to the statute for the distribution of the estates and effects of persons dying intestate. The testator died on Sept. 13, 1864, and his sister Sarah Scales, the mother of William and Susan Scales, was his heiress-at-law, and sole next-of-kin. The plaintiff, Sarah Jane Scales, was the only daughter of John Richerson Scales, a son of Sarah Scales, who predeceased her. Sarah Scales died intestate in 1872, leaving William Scales, Susan Scales, and the plaintiff, Sarah Jane Scales, her next-of-kin. Susan Scales died in 1879. A

Questions arose under the testator's will, and in 1890 an originating summons was taken out by the acting trustees of the will, against William Scales, as sole defendant, asking, among other things, whether William Scales was entitled on the death of Susan Scales to the whole of the income of the residuary personal estate of the testator during his life. By an order of Aug. 11, 1890, on this summons by the judge in chambers, it was declared that William Scales was entitled as from the death of Susan Scales by implication during his life to the moiety of the income of the residuary personal estate of the testator bequeathed to Susan Scales during her life as well as to the other moiety of such income. William Scales died in October, 1890, after the plaintiff had commenced her action, and his representatives claimed this income for his estate from the trustees. Though the plaintiff, Sarah Jane Scales, was not made a party to this summons, a correspondence had taken place on the subject between her solicitors and those of the trustees, and a copy of the order made on the summons was served on her solicitors. She had in July, 1890, commenced the present action against the trustees, claiming the appointment of new trustees and the execution of the trusts of the will and by her amended statement of claim, after adding the representatives of William Scales as defendants, she also claimed a declaration that she was not adversely bound by the order made on this summons. CHITTY, J.—The plaintiff was not a party to the proceedings on the original summons. No fault is to be imputed to the trustees on this account; for, although they were aware that the plaintiff had some claim in the matter, she did not insist upon being made a party, and the summons was heard and disposed of in her absence. The question is, whether the plaintiff is bound by the order made upon the summons. It is true that she had not at the date of the order on the summons clothed herself with her right as legal personal representative of her grandmother, Sarah Scales, the testator's sole next-of-kin; but it is the common practice of the court to allow the person entitled to take out representation to be added as a party, and in the event of its being shown that the deceased's estate is entitled to some interest, the order does not go till after letters of administration have been taken out. D

In my opinion, the plaintiff is not bound by the order of Aug. 11, 1890. I think that, on the true construction of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 46, it is necessary that the order of the court should state that the judge has proceeded in the absence of any person representing or entitled to represent the deceased's estate, or has appointed some person to represent it, and my opinion is founded on the language of the order itself. There need not be a separate order to this effect, but it must appear on the face of the order that the court dispensed with the representative. This is apparent from the terms of the rule. "The order so made, and any order consequent thereon," applies, of course, to the case where the court appoints some person to represent the estate, and equally applies, in my opinion, where the court proceeds in the absence of a representative. But there must be a constat on the face of the order that the judge's attention was drawn to the fact, and that he decided to proceed. E

On a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, the court is not bound to have before it all the persons whose interests may be affected by the order as in an old suit in Chancery. That is one of the advantages of the order, and the decisions show clearly that, where the court does not require other parties to be served with the summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 6, there is no necessity for its expressing this on the face of the order. But R.S.C., Ord. 55 was subsequent in date to R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 46, and affords no ground for varying that rule. Under that rule I F

A think the decision of the court to proceed must be shown on the face of the order. It has been the constant practice to draw up orders, either dispensing with the representative, or appointing some person to represent the estate. Although, therefore, I am deciding the point for the first time, my decision is not a new one, but is in accordance with the established practice.

Prohibition—Ground for granting writ—Want of jurisdiction apparent on face of proceedings—Consent to exercise of jurisdiction by applicant—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 61), s. 24.

Where want of jurisdiction is apparent on the face of proceedings the grant of a writ of prohibition is of course, and the applicant cannot be precluded by any consent or acquiescence in the exercise of the jurisdiction.

F

The lease of a farm provided that the procedure contained in s. 7 to s. 28 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, should apply to all claims for compensation under the lease. On determination of the lease, the tenant's claim for compensation, which included matters both within and not within the Act of 1883, was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrator awarded compensation for matters both within and not within the Act. The tenant obtained an order in the county court to enforce the award under s. 24 of the Act of 1883. The landlord, who had acquiesced in the exercise of the county court jurisdiction, applied for a writ of prohibition against the enforcement of the award, which the Queen's Bench Division refused on the grounds of discretion.

Held: as the want of jurisdiction was apparent on the face of the award by the inclusion of claims which were not within the Act of 1883, the writ of prohibition must be granted against the enforcement of that part of the award which was not within the Act of 1883 and the landlord was not precluded by having acquiesced in the county court jurisdiction.

Appeal by H. R. Farquharson from an order of the Divisional Court (CHARLES and WRIGHT, JJ.), discharging a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition to the county court of Dorsetshire, on the ground that, under the circumstances the Court had a discretion to refuse the prohibition. H

The appellant, Farquharson, let to the respondent, Morgan, a farm by a lease, in which it was provided that the clauses of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, relating to "procedure," should apply as well to any claims of the outgoing tenant for allowance or compensation to be made under the provisions of the lease as to any claim under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. The lease provided for certain allowances and compensation being made to the outgoing tenant at the expiration of the lease in respect of various matters which were not the subject of allowance or compensation under the Act of 1883. The lease was determined on March 25, 1891, and the respondent claimed allowances and compensation in respect of matters within the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, and in respect of matters not within that Act. These claims were referred to arbitration and an award was made. I

The respondent made an application to the county court to enforce the award under s. 24 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. It was apparent that the

A award was bad because it awarded a lump sum in respect of all claims, and by consent of both parties it was remitted to the umpire. An amended award was made which on its face showed the matters in respect of which the sums thereby awarded to the respondent were given. Some of these sums were awarded in respect of matters within the Act of 1883, and some in respect of matters not within that Act. The appellant appealed to the county court against this amended
B award, and his appeal was dismissed. He thereupon appealed to the Queen's Bench Division when the matter was remitted to the county court to be re-heard. Upon the re-hearing in the county court the award was wholly affirmed, and the respondent subsequently applied for an order enforcing the whole award under s. 24 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. The county court judge made an order to that effect. The appellant then applied for and obtained a rule nisi for a prohibition to the county court against enforcing the award under s. 24 of the Act of 1883.
C Upon argument this rule was discharged by a Divisional Court. The appellant now appealed to the Court of Appeal.

D Feb. 2, 1894. LORD HALSBURY.—In this case, with every disposition to decline to interfere with the course of litigation, and with a strong desire to prevent a persistent litigant from proceeding further, and with the conviction that, if it is possible for a person to render himself incapable of applying for a prohibition, this appellant has done so, I have striven to see whether we could not refuse
E this application, but I am constrained to say that the writ of prohibition must issue, so far as the application relates to any claim which is outside of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. It has long since been held that where the objection to the jurisdiction of an inferior court appears upon the face of the record it is immaterial how the matter is brought before the superior court, for the superior court must interfere to protect the prerogative of the Crown by prohibiting the
F inferior court from exceeding its jurisdiction. That is to say, where the want of jurisdiction appears upon the libel, as in an ecclesiastical court, or upon the face of the record, and does not depend upon a mere matter of fact, and a cause is entertained by an inferior court which is clearly beyond its jurisdiction, no consent of parties will justify the superior court in refusing a prohibition.

Looking, then, at the present case and at what appears upon the face of the record, and considering the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, and what has been done in the county court, it is impossible to doubt that the county court judge, in seeking to give execution under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, in respect of the matters which were outside of that Act, was exceeding his jurisdiction. The things in respect of which there is jurisdiction under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, are set out in that Act and by s. 24, the county court judge
H may order the compensation awarded in respect of those things to be recovered in the same way as money ordered by a county court under its ordinary jurisdiction to be paid is recoverable. In this case, therefore, the position is this, that the parties seek to give the judge jurisdiction to put the powers of the court as to execution into force in respect of other matters which are not within the Act. Under these circumstances I repeat that I am unable to resist the conclusion that
I the writ of prohibition must issue; but considering the course which this litigation has taken, I think that the appellant should have no costs, except in this court.

LOPES, L.J.—This case raises the much vexed question whether the grant of prohibition is discretionary, or whether it is demandable of right. It seems to me that there has always been recognised a distinction between what I will call a latent want of jurisdiction, e.g., something becoming manifest in the course of the proceedings, and what I will call a patent want of jurisdiction, e.g., a want of jurisdiction apparent on the face of the proceedings. While in cases of latent want of jurisdiction there has always been a great conflict of judicial opinion whether the grant of the writ was discretionary or not, the authorities seem unanimous in deciding that where the want of jurisdiction is patent the grant of the writ of prohibition is of course.

LORD MANSFIELD, in Buggin v. Burnett (1), held, that the court was not bound to grant a prohibition to a party who had acquiesced in the proceedings of the court below, except where the absence of jurisdiction was apparent on the face of the proceedings. In Bodenham v. Ricketts (2) LORD DENMAN laid down the rule in the same terms as LORD MANSFIELD, and, about the same time, the same rule was adopted in a considered judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Yates v. Palmer (3). In the elaborate opinion of the judges, delivered by WILLES, J., to the House of Lords in London Corpn. v. Cox (4), it is said (L.R. 2 H.L. at p. 279):

"upon application being made in proper time upon sufficient materials by a party who has not by misconduct or laches lost his right, its grant or refusal is not in the mere discretion of the court"; and in the same case it is said (ibid. at p. 283):

"where the defect is not apparent, and depends on some fact in the knowledge of the applicant which he had an opportunity of bringing forward in the court below, and he has thought proper, without excuse, to allow that court to proceed to judgment without setting up the objection, and without moving for a prohibition in the first instance, although it should seem that the jurisdiction to grant a prohibition in respect of the right of the Crown is not taken away, for mere acquiescence does not give jurisdiction (Knowles v. Holden (5); yet, considering the conduct of the applicant, the importance of making an end of litigation, and that the writ, though of right, is not of course, the court would decline to interpose except perhaps upon an irresistible case, and an excuse for the delay, such as disability, malpractice, or matter newly come to the knowledge of the applicant."

It was held in that case, that the writ was not of course, inasmuch as there might be circumstances which would justify the court in refusing it, such as undue delay, insufficient materials, or misconduct, or laches by the party applying for it; but there is nothing in the case contravening the rule I have mentioned where the absence of jurisdiction is apparent on the face of the proceedings; in fact there is an express exception of such cases.

In 1888, in Broad v. Perkins (6), the question whether in the circumstances of that case the court had any jurisdiction to refuse a writ of prohibition was directed to be argued before the full Court of Appeal, and LORD ESHER, M.R., delivering the judgment of the full court, repeated the opinion of WILLES, J., in London Corpn. v. Cox (4), which I have cited.

The result of the authorities appears to me to be this, that the granting of a prohibition is not an absolute right in every case where an inferior tribunal exceeds its jurisdiction, and that where the absence or excess of jurisdiction is not apparent upon the face of the proceedings, it is discretionary with the court to decide whether the party applying has not, by laches or misconduct, lost his right to the writ to which under other circumstances he would be entitled. The reason why, notwithstanding such acquiescence, a prohibition is granted where the want of jurisdiction is apparent on the face of the proceedings is explained by LORD DENMAN in Bodenham v. Ricketts (2), to be for the sake of the public, because "the case might be a precedent if allowed to stand without impeachment"; and I would add for myself, because it is a want of jurisdiction of which the court is informed by the proceedings before it, and which the judge should have observed, and a point which he should himself have taken.

If it were possible for him to do so, it is abundantly clear that the appellant has by his conduct precluded himself from claiming the interposition of the court in his favour. That he has acquiesced in the proceedings is beyond dispute. I cannot imagine a stronger case of acquiescence. But I am of opinion that the

A award on the face of it discloses a want of jurisdiction. It contains and deals with matters which are not the subject of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, matters outside that Act and which cannot be enforced under s. 24 of that Act. In such circumstances most reluctantly I am compelled to hold that the writ of prohibition must issue, and that this appeal must be allowed.

B DAYEY, L.J.—There are two principles which are engrained in our law. One is that parties cannot by contract oust the jurisdiction of the Queen's courts. This has been somewhat modified by the power given to the court by s. 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (now s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889), to give effect to an agreement to refer disputes to arbitration subject to certain well-known conditions; but, subject to this power, it is no defence to an action to allege that the parties have agreed to refer the question in dispute to arbitration, or to provide for its settlement in some other mode. The other principle is correlative to the first—that the parties cannot by agreement confer upon any court or judge a coercive jurisdiction which the court or judge does not by law possess. To do so would be a usurpation of the prerogative of the Crown, and it has always been the policy of our law, as a question of public order, to keep inferior courts strictly within their proper sphere of jurisdiction: (Worthington v. Jeffries (7)). It follows that a party, notwithstanding that he has contracted to have the dispute decided, or a decision in the matter enforced, by a court not possessing by law jurisdiction, may refuse to be bound by his contract and object to the jurisdiction, subject to the provisions embodied in the Arbitration Act, 1889, so far as applicable. It also follows that you cannot give jurisdiction by acquiescence. These principles are so well known that they need no illustration from decided cases or other authority.

E In the present case the appellant who applies for a prohibition, has contracted by the lease of Nov. 29, 1888, that the clauses of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, relating to procedure, and contained in ss. 7 to 28 (both inclusive), shall apply as well to any claims of the outgoing tenant for allowance or compensation to be made under the provisions of the lease as to any claim under the said Act.

F The lease makes provision for certain allowances and compensation being made to an outgoing tenant at the expiration of the lease as to various matters which are not the subjects of allowance or compensation under the Act. An amended award has been made dealing as well with matters which are properly subjects of allowance or compensation under the Act as with matters in respect of which allowance or compensation can only be claimed under the provisions of the lease; and the amended award on the face of it shows the matters in respect of which the sums thereby awarded are given. On Sept. 24, 1893, the present respondent made an application to the county court to enforce the award, and the judge, though he had doubts whether he had jurisdiction, made an order to that effect. The present appellant applied to the High Court for a prohibition against the county court enforcing the award or proceeding further with the application. A Divisional Court has dismissed that application on the grounds that under the circumstances the court had a discretion to refuse the prohibition on the application of the present appellant.

H The jurisdiction of the county court in the matter is statutory, and is conferred by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, s. 24 of which is in the following terms:

I "When any money agreed or awarded or ordered on appeal to be paid for compensation, costs, or otherwise, is not paid within fourteen days after the time when it is agreed or awarded or ordered to be paid, it shall be recoverable upon order made by the judge of the county court, as money ordered by a county court under its ordinary jurisdiction to be paid is recoverable."

It is obvious that this section only applies to money agreed, or awarded, or ordered on appeal, to be paid in respect of matters within the Act, and gives no jurisdiction over awards as to other matters made pursuant to a contractual submission or with the consent of parties. Indeed it was not, and could not be, denied that, so far as the award related to matters outside the Act, the county court judge had no jurisdiction to enforce the award, and the appellant was prima facie entitled to the prohibition. But it was argued that the granting of a prohibition is discretionary, and that the applicant was estopped or precluded by his conduct from claiming a prohibition. Reliance was placed on a well-known passage in the judgment of WILLES, J., in London Corpn. v. Cox (4) (L.R. 2 H.L. at p. 279), which has been cited by LOPES, L.J. This passage has been adopted by the full Court of Appeal as a correct statement of the law, in Broad v. Perkins (6). It will, however, be observed that the judge's statement is confined to cases where the defect is not apparent, and depends upon some fact in the knowledge of an applicant which he might have brought forward in the court below, but has kept back without excuse, i.e., where an applicant has been guilty of some misconduct in the proceedings, and has in a sense misled the court.

To the same effect is LORD MANSFIELD's judgment in Buggin v. Burnett (1), where he says (4 Burr. at p. 2037) :

"If it appears upon the face of the proceedings that the court below had no jurisdiction, a prohibition may be issued at any time either before or after sentence, because all is a nullity; it is coram non judice. But where it does not appear upon the face of the proceedings, if the defendant below will lie by or suffer that court to go on under an apparent jurisdiction, as upon a contract made at sea, it would be unreasonable that this party, who, when defendant below, has thus lain by and concealed from the court below a collateral matter, should come hither after sentence against him there, and suggest that collateral matter as a cause of prohibition, and obtain a prohibition upon it, after all this acquiescence in the jurisdiction of the court below."

This passage was quoted by PARKE, B., in Roberts v. Humby (8) in which case the court granted a prohibition at the instance of a party to the proceedings in a case where the want of jurisdiction appeared on the face of the proceedings even after execution in the inferior court.

The reason of the distinction between cases in which the excess of jurisdiction appears on the face of the proceedings, and where it does not so appear, is explained by COLERIDGE, J., in Marsden v. Wardle (9) (3 E. & B. at p. 701). The judge is there evidently contrasting cases where the excess of jurisdiction depends on the evidence of the complainant with the cases in which it is apparent on the face of the proceedings. In the county court it is true there is no record strictly speaking, but the distinction does not, I think, depend on the existence of a formal record, but is one of substance, whether the defect is apparent or depends on evidence. In the present case the jurisdiction invoked is the creation of a statute not even conferring jurisdiction in general terms, but confined to a particular defined subject-matter. The first question which a judge has to ask himself, when he is invited to exercise a limited statutory jurisdiction is, whether the case falls within the defined ambit of the statute, and it is his duty to decline to make an order as judge if and so far as the matter is outside the jurisdiction, and, if he does not do so, he may (if a judge of an inferior court) be restrained by prohibition. In the present case the limits of the jurisdiction appeared on the face of the statute, and the fact of the excess appeared on the face of the amended award which the court was asked to enforce.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the appellant is not precluded from relying on the excess of jurisdiction in the county court either by his covenant in the lease or by the previous proceedings in relation to the award. In Jones v. James (10), which was cited on behalf of the respondent, it is to be observed that it was doubtful whether the court had exceeded its jurisdiction, and ERLE, J., seems to have treated the matter as an irregularity in practice which might be cured by the defendant's waiver; and Mouflet v. Washburn (11) seems to have been a case of the same character: see Jones v. Owen (12). The summons asks for a prohibition against the county court judge enforcing the whole award, but at the Bar counsel

A for the appellant limited the prohibition asked for to so much of the award as dealt with matters outside the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. Although I think that the appellant is not precluded from asking for a prohibition, yet he is doing so in breach of his contract, and I think there should be no costs in the court below, but the appellant should have the costs of the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Between 1881 and 1885 the tenant for life borrowed sums of money under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, for improvements, authorised by s. 25 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, on his estates, and those sums were secured by rentcharges in the form prescribed by that Act. Between 1883 and 1885 the settlement trustee bought up the rentcharges out of capital money of the settlement fund requiring investment. In 1888 those parts of the settled estates on which the improvements had been executed were sold and, under the powers of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the rentcharges were shifted to other portions of the estate.

G

Held: (i) the capital money expended in buying up the rentcharges was an investment under s. 60 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, and was not expended in "redeeming" the rentcharges "or otherwise providing for the payment thereof" within the meaning of s. 1 of the Settled Land Acts (Amendment) Act, 1887, and the rentcharges were not merged for the benefit of the inheritance charged therewith; (ii) s. 1 of the Settled Land Acts (Amendment) Act, 1887, was not retrospective so as to enable the tenant for life to recover from capital for the instalments previously paid by him out of income, and, accordingly, the tenant for life could only recover from capital for those instalments which accrued due after the passing of the Act of 1887 and after the time when he first raised the question and ceased to pay them on Mar. 25, 1899.

Adjourned summons.

The applicant, Philip John Canning Howard, tenant for life of the Corby and Coniscliffe estates in the counties of Cumberland and Durham, asked (i) that it might be declared that, having regard to the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1887, all capital moneys applied by the defendant, Henry Stourton, the surviving trustee of the settlement, in the purchase of specified rentcharges should be deemed to have been applied in payment for improvements authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1882, and that accordingly the tenant for life or other person for the time being beneficially entitled to possession of the estates was under no liability to make any repayments to the trustee in respect of the rentcharges or any of them, and that all such rentcharges should be deemed to have merged in or for the benefit of the inheritance charged therewith; (ii) that the trustee should be ordered to pay and transfer to the tenant for life all moneys and investments in the hands or under the control of the trustee, and representing any part of the repayments theretofore made by the tenant for life to the trustee in respect of the rentcharges or any of them; and (iii) in case the judge should be of opinion that the capital moneys so applied could not be deemed to have been applied in payment for such improvements, then that proper directions might be given for the redemption or making other provision of or for the rentcharges by the trustee by means of further capital moneys in his hands and comprised in the settlement. D

Between 1881 and 1885 the tenant for life borrowed from the Lands Improvement Company six separate sums of money, under the powers of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864. The loans were raised for the purpose of effecting certain improvements on the estates and were secured by six rentcharges for twenty-five years, created by the Inclosure Commissioners under s. 49 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, charged on the inheritance of the estates and payable half-yearly, and made in the prescribed form under the Act which contained no provision for the redemption of the rentcharges. At various times in and previously to 1885, acting under s. 60 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, the trustee bought up the rentcharges out of trust moneys in his hands for investment in real estate. Subsequently to such respective purchases the tenant for life paid the instalments of the respective rentcharges to the trustee who repaid to him so much of the instalments as represented interest, but retained and invested as capital of the settlement funds so much of the instalments as represented capital. In 1888 the parts of the settled estates on which the improvements had been effected, with other parts, were sold; and on the occasion of such sale the rentcharges were, under the powers of the Settled Land Act, 1882, shifted from the portions of the estate which were sold to other portions thereof. The tenant for life paid the rentcharges up to 25 Mar., 1889. G
H

The court assumed for the purpose of this case that the improvements effected

A by the loans were improvements within the meaning of s. 25 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Carson for the tenant for life.

R. J. Parker for the settlement trustee.

B Feb. 18, 1892. STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued.—Under s. 21 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, capital money arising under the Act may be applied “in discharge, purchase, or redemption of encumbrances affecting the inheritance of the settled land or other the whole estate the subject of the settlement.”

C and under sub-s. (3) “in payment for any improvement authorised by this Act.” The nature of the improvements is described by s. 25, and s. 26 regulates the mode in which the capital money is to be applied for the purpose of the improvement. Section 28 provides that

D “the tenant for life and each of his successors in title having under the settlement a limited estate or interest only in the settled land shall, during such period, if any, as the Land Commissioners by certificate in any case prescribe, maintain and repair at his own expense every improvement executed under the foregoing provisions of this Act”;

E and by s. 22 (2), the application of the capital money for the purposes of the Act is to be made according to the direction of the tenant for life. Under that Act the question arose in Re Knatchbull's Settled Estate (1), whether charges created under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, could be paid out of capital moneys under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and it was held that they could not. That being the state of the law, the Settled Land Acts (Amendment) Act, 1887, was passed. Section 1 provides :

F “Where any improvement of a kind authorised by the Act of 1882 has been or may be made either before or after the passing of this Act, and a rentcharge whether temporal or perpetual has been or may be created in pursuance of any Act of Parliament with the object of paying off any moneys advanced for the purpose of defraying the expenses of such improvement, any capital money expended in redeeming such rentcharge or otherwise providing for the payment thereof shall be deemed to be applied in payment for an improvement authorised by the Act of 1882.”

Section 2 provides :

G “Any improvement in payment for which capital money is applied, or deemed to be applied, under the provisions of the preceding section shall be deemed to be an improvement within the meaning of s. 28 of the Act of 1882, and the provisions of such last-mentioned section shall, so far as applicable, be deemed to apply to such improvement.”

H Then, by the last clause, s. 3, the Act is to be construed as one with the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the Settled Land Act, 1884.

I The question which I have to decide is, first, whether what was done prior to the passing of the Act of 1887 can be undone, so to speak—in other words, whether I can give effect to the application contained in the first two paras. of the summons; and secondly, whether as regards all instalments of the rentcharge which have not been paid, a prospective order can be made. The Act of 1887 takes a peculiar form. It does not say that these shall be deemed to be encumbrances within the meaning of s. 21 (2) of the Act of 1882. It says that

The object of that seems to have been to introduce the provisions of s. 28 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, which is done by s. 2 of the Act of 1887, and to impose upon the tenant for life the duty of keeping up and maintaining the improvements which have been effected, not under the Settled Land Act, 1882, but under the Act of 1864. A

Does this section apply to what has been done in the present case? Between the years 1882 and 1887, the rentcharges were transferred to the trustees of the settlement, who paid the consideration money no doubt out of capital money within the meaning of the Act of 1882. But did that constitute an expenditure of capital money in "redeeming" the rentcharge, "or otherwise providing for the payment thereof?" It was not an expenditure in "redeeming" the rentcharge, because it was an expenditure of capital money by way of investment under s. 60 of the Act of 1864, and the rentcharge remained on foot, and remained payable by the tenant for life in accordance with the terms of the Act. The only difference introduced was, that payment was now made to the trustee of the settlement, and not to the persons in whose favour the rentcharges were originally created. Then, was it an expenditure of money "or otherwise providing for the payment of the rentcharges"? The payment still remained to be made, and was made by the tenant for life under the provisions of the Act of 1864; and it seems to me, therefore, that the application, so far as it relates to past transactions, is not brought within the language of the Act of 1887. Again, can I make an order directing the trustee to recoup to the tenant for life out of capital money, the payments made by him between 1882 and 1887? That is not providing for the payment of those instalments of the rentcharges, for they have already been paid by the tenant for life. I do not think, therefore, that such an order falls within the terms of the Act of 1887. That, in my opinion, disposes of the case. B

I wish to add, however, that I am not satisfied that s. 1 of the Act of 1887 was meant to be retrospective, so as to bring within its operation payments made before the passing of the Act. It no doubt is clearly meant to apply to improvements made either before or after the passing of the Act of 1887. It clearly applies also to rentcharges created both before and after the passing of the Act. But when we come to the previous dealing with the application of the moneys, the language is no longer distinct and clear as it ought to be in order that the enactment may have a retrospective effect. In the first part of s. 1 of the Act of 1887 it is provided that: E

"Where any improvement of a kind authorised by the Act of 1882 has been or may be made either before or after the passing of this Act and a rentcharge whether temporal or perpetual has been or may be created . . ."

But then it goes on: G

not to be or to have been, as one would have expected if the object of the legislature had been to make the section retrospective. I think, therefore, that the application contained in the first two paras. of the summons does not fall within the powers conferred by the Act of 1887. H

Then arises the question whether I can direct that provision should be made for the payment of the rentcharge so far as it remains unpaid, from the time when the Act passed. It is settled by the decisions in Re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates (2) and Re Lord Egmont's Settled Estates (3) that such provision may be made where the rentcharge remains subsisting on a portion of the estate which has been improved; but counsel for the trustee very properly called my attention to the fact that the portion of the settled estate which had been improved had been sold, and he referred me to the expressions of doubt that are contained in the judgments of the various members of the Court of Appeal in Re Hotchkin's Settled Estates (4) whether under the Act of 1882 capital money could be applied in paying for improvements on lands which were no longer in settlement. I have read carefully those judgments, and unquestionably there would be great doubt, if we were simply dealing with the Act of 1882, whether that could be done. But we are dealing with the Act of 1887, and the proposed application seems to me to be within the I

A language of the Act. An improvement has been effected, a rentcharge has been created with the object of paying off moneys advanced for the purpose of defraying the expenses of such improvement; and, that being so, any capital money expended in providing for the payment thereof is to be deemed to be applied in payment for an improvement authorised by the Act of 1882.

B I think that the proposed application falls within the language of the Act, and I can see no reason why, in justice, it should not in this respect be granted. What has been done is this: the rentcharges have been transferred to other portions of the estate, and the improved portion of the estate has been sold free from those rentcharges. I have no doubt that a good price was got, and that the persons entitled in remainder under the settlement have benefited by the improvements which have been made, in this way, that an increased price has been got for the estate by reason of those improvements having been effected. I cannot see, therefore, that there is anything which ought to prevent the tenant for life applying successfully to have capital moneys expended in providing for the payment of these improvements, in accordance with the Act of 1887. Therefore, I think that on para. (iii) of the summons an order ought to be made directing that the instalments of the rentcharge which have accrued due since Mar. 25, 1889, when the question first arose, and remain unpaid, should be provided for out of capital money.

Order accordingly.

H The defendant, a manufacturer in France, employed the plaintiff as agent to sell his goods in England. By an agreement in writing, dated Dec. 26, 1890, it was provided that the defendant would pay the expenses of the London agency up to £2,200 a year, and that, if the plaintiff should be compelled to make advances either for general expenses or otherwise, he should be "secured by the stock of goods which shall be in his hands" which the defendant engaged should never fall below a fixed value. The agency was determined by the defendant, wrongfully as the plaintiff contended, and the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to the security of the goods in his hands against advances for expenses which he had made. The defendant contended that the agreement was one by which a right in equity to personal chattels or to any charge or security thereon was conferred so as to be a bill of sale, and that it was void for non-registration, and he sought to remove the goods in the hands of the plaintiff without satisfying the plaintiff's claim for advances.

I

Held: the agreement merely entitled the plaintiff to retain goods which came into his hands and conferred no power to take possession of any goods, so that there was an agreement coupled with possession which gave rise to a legal right and not to an equitable right, and, therefore, the agreement was not a bill of sale within s. 3 of the Bills of Sale Acts and was not void for non-registration.

Motion for an interim injunction.

The plaintiff, as agent, brought an action against the defendant, the principal, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant from interfering with the rights of the plaintiff in respect of certain goods in his hands under an agreement in writing dated Dec. 26, 1890. The defendant contended that the agreement was a bill of sale and void for non-registration. It was agreed that, if the agreement

A was a bill of sale, the case would be disposed of. Accordingly, it was on this question that the case was argued and decided, and on which it is reported.

The defendant, Delobbel-Flipo, was a manufacturer at Roulaix in the republic of France, and the plaintiff, Morris, was employed by him to act as his agent for the sale of his goods in England. After the commencement of the agency the terms were reduced into writing by an agreement, in the French language. By B this agreement, dated Dec. 26, 1890, it was agreed that the plaintiff should be the general agent of the defendant in England at a salary of £240 per annum, and £10 per quarter in addition, and a commission of four per cent. on the amount of business done above £18,000 after Jan. 1, 1891. And the agreement contained a clause of which the following is a translation :

C "[The defendant] will supply all the expenses of the London agency which may reach the sum of £2,200 sterling per annum, including the rent of the agency, and if [the plaintiff] is compelled to make advances either on account of general expenses or for any other business, he will be covered and secured by the stock of goods which shall be in his hands, and which [the defendant] engages never to allow to fall below 100,000 francs."

D The agreement was expressed to last for seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years. The defendant purported to determine the agreement of Dec. 26, 1890, and at the time of such determination there were goods of the defendant to a considerable value in the hands of the plaintiff; and the plaintiff had also claims against the defendant in respect of advances which had been made by him, and which he claimed to have secured under the agreement of Dec. 26, 1890, upon the goods so in his hands. The defendant contended that the agreement was one by which a right in equity to personal chattels, as a charge or security thereon was conferred and was E a bill of sale under s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and s. 3 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, and was void for non-registration.

By s. 3 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, it was provided :

F "This Act shall apply to every bill of sale executed on or after the first day of January, 1879 (whether the same be absolute or subject or not to any trust), whereby the holder or grantee has power, either with or without notice, and either immediately or at any future time, to seize or take possession of any personal chattels comprised in or made subject to such bill of sale."

By s. 4 of the same Act a bill of sale was defined to include (among other things) :

G "Any agreement whether intended or not to be followed by the execution of any other instrument by which a right in equity to any personal chattels or to any charge or security thereon shall be conferred."

Section 3 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, provided that the expression "bill of sale" in that Act should have the same meaning as in the Act of 1878, except that the later Act should not apply to any documents which might be given "otherwise than by way of security for the payment of money." By s. 9 H of the same Act a bill of sale given by way of security for the payment of money is void unless made in the form contained in the schedule to the Act.

Buckley, Q.C., and Rose Innes for the plaintiff.

Hastings, Q.C., and Mulligan for the defendant.

I STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued : The whole of the facts relating to this case have not yet been investigated; but the motion has been argued on a point of law which it is said is decisive of the case, viz., that the agreement on which the plaintiff relies is void under the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882. It was contended on the plaintiff's behalf that the terms of the agency were arranged and agreed before they were reduced to writing, and that the plaintiff could rely on those terms, apart from the document of Dec. 26, 1890. I think this contention cannot prevail. The terms of the agency have been reduced to writing, and the written document is the only evidence of the agreement. That is settled by Re Townsend, Ex parte Parsons (1) and Newlove v. Shrewsbury (2).

The document in question in the present case is not a bill of sale in the ordinary sense; but a stringent enactment has been passed to which I must give effect if the case is within it. Section 3 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, throws us back for the definition of a bill of sale upon the Bills of Sale Act, 1878; and it is contended on behalf of the defendant that the document is a bill of sale because it is an agreement "by which a right in equity to personal chattels or a charge or security thereon is conferred" within the meaning of s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. The meaning of those words was considered in Reeves v. Barlow (3). BOWEN, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in that case said (12 Q.B.D. at pp. 441, 442):

"The learned counsel for the appellant contended that the previously exempted case of such building agreements was directly met by the new words which the Act of 1878 for the first time introduced into the interpretation clause, and that the present agreement must be registered as being an agreement by which a right in equity to personal chattels is conferred. On the part of the respondent it was urged that a right to after-acquired property was not a right to personal chattels within the meaning of the Act of 1878. It is not necessary to pronounce an authoritative decision on this very grave point (as to which see, per LORD CHELMSFORD, Holroyd v. Marshall (4), because, in our judgment, whatever right is conferred by the clause of the building agreement now under discussion is not a right in equity at all but a right at law. Down to the time when the building materials were brought upon the landlord's premises there was no contract relating to any specific goods at all, nor anything which could be subject to a decree for specific performance. The contract was only to apply to goods when brought upon the premises, and until this happened there was no right or interest in equity to any goods at all. Upon the other hand, the moment the goods were brought upon the premises the property in them passed in law, and nothing was left upon which any equity as distinct from law could attach. No further performance of the contract was necessary, nor could be enforced. The builder's agreement accordingly was at no time an equitable assignment of anything, but a mere legal contract that, upon the happening of a particular event, the property in law should pass in certain chattels which that event itself would identify without the necessity of any further act on the part of anybody, and which could not be identified before."

In Re Hardwick, Ex parte Hubbard (5) it was laid down by the Court of Appeal that the words of s. 4 were intended to bring within the Act documents which create a right in equity as distinct from a right at law. It was there held that where goods were pledged as security for a loan and delivered to the pledgee, a document signed by the pledgor recording the transaction and regulating the rights of the pledgee as to the sale of the goods is not a bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882. As to the question whether the documents conferred a "right in equity to personal chattels," BOWEN, L.J., said (17 Q.B.D. at p. 700):

"The answer is that these documents do not confer any right in equity, but only regulate the exercise of a legal right. I think that those words were intended to bring within the Act documents which create a right in equity as distinct from a right at law."

It is, therefore, necessary in the present case to inquire whether the document of Dec. 26, 1890, creates a right in equity or a right at law. For the defendant, it was contended that the right was in equity only, and Holroyd v. Marshall (4) was relied on. In that case a security was created on certain machinery, implements, and things specified in a schedule and fixed in a particular mill, and there was a covenant that all machinery, implements, and things which during the continuance of the security should be fixed or placed in or about the mill, in addition to, or in substitution for, the said premises or any part thereof, should during

A such continuance be subject to the trust, powers, provisos, and declarations there-inbefore declared and expressed concerning the premises. The debtor, who remained in possession, sold or exchanged some of the old machinery and introduced new machinery; but no assignment of such new machinery was executed, nor was any act done by or on behalf of the secured creditors to constitute a formal taking of possession of the added machinery.

B It was held in the House of Lords, overruling the decision of LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., that in equity the added machinery was subject to the security, and that the secured creditors were entitled to it as against an execution creditor of the debtor's. LORD CAMPBELL in his judgment said (2 De G.F. & J. at pp. 602, 603):

C "I am of opinion that notwithstanding the equitable title of the plaintiffs to this property, as they had not perfected their title to it by any intervening act before possession taken under the execution, the judgment creditor is to be preferred. Till possession taken by the plaintiffs, they had only jus ad rem. The property remained in the judgment debtor, and the machinery was part of his goods and chattels liable to be taken under the feri facias. My judgment rests upon LORD BACON's maxim:

D 'Licet dispositio de interesse futuro sit inutilis tamen fieri potest declaratio præcedens quæ sortiatur effectum interveniente novo actu.' "

LORD CHELMSFORD, in giving judgment in the House of Lords, went into the question of right at law or in equity. He said (10 H.L.Cas. at p. 216):

E "At law an assignment of a thing which has no existence, actual or potential, at the time of the execution of the deed is altogether void, Robinson v. Macdonnell (6). But where future property is assigned, and after it comes into existence possession is either delivered by the assignor or is allowed by him to be taken by the assignee, in either case there would be the 'novus actus interveniens' of the maxim of LORD BACON, upon which LORD CAMPBELL rested his decree, and the property would pass."

F And again he says (ibid. at pp. 219, 220):

G "The judgment of LORD CAMPBELL, resting, as he says, upon LORD BACON's maxim, determines that some subsequent act is necessary to enable 'the equitable interest to prevail against a legal interest subsequently bona fide acquired.' It is agreed that this maxim relates only to the acquisition of a legal right to future property. It can be extended to equitable rights and interests (if at all) only by analogy; but in thus proposing to enlarge the sphere of the rule, it appears to me that sufficient attention has not been paid to the different effect and operation of agreements relating to future property at law and in equity. At law, property non-existing, but to be acquired at a future time, is not assignable; in equity it is so. At law (as we have seen), although a power is given in the deed of assignment to take possession of after-acquired property, no interest is transferred, even as between the parties themselves, unless possession is actually taken; in equity, it is not disputed that the moment the property comes into existence the agreement operates upon it."

H Therefore the distinction drawn by LORD CHELMSFORD appears to be that an assignment (for value) of future property without possession creates an equitable title only; but if possession is actually taken of the property when it comes into existence, then a legal interest is acquired.

I In the present case no right is created of any kind in any goods unless and until they reach the hands of the plaintiff. The agreement between him and the defendant is one of agency, and consequently not one of which specific performance would be decreed by a court of equity. It confers no power to take possession of any goods, it merely entitles the plaintiff to retain possession of the things come to his hands. Until goods are delivered to the plaintiff there is no contract relating to any specific goods at all; if the defendant refused to send goods to the plaintiff, the remedy would be in damages only, and not by way of specific performance.

But when the goods come to the possession of the plaintiff, then, according to the distinction drawn in Holroyd v. Marshall (4), there is a state of things, viz., an agreement coupled with possession, which gives rise to a legal right. It gives rise to no right in equity as distinguished from a right at law. And consequently, according to the principle laid down in Reeves v. Barlow (3) and Ex parte Hubbard (5), the document of Dec. 26, 1890, cannot be regarded as a bill of sale. A

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Mills v. Charlesworth (7) was much relied on on behalf of the defendant. In that case the owner of goods that had been seized under a fi. fa. agreed with the defendant that the defendant should pay out the sheriff, that the goods should be pledged to the defendant as security for his advance, and that the sheriff's officer should hold the goods on behalf of the defendant. The agreement was reduced into writing, and signed by the owner of the goods, and the sheriff acquiesced, and his officer retained the custody of the goods on behalf of the defendant. LORD ESHER, M.R., was of opinion that the document there in question was not a bill of sale, but the majority of the court thought otherwise. Their decision, however, as it seems to me, turned upon the fact that there was no physical change in the possession of the goods. When the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., is looked at it seems plain that this is the ground upon which it rests. He says (25 Q.B.D. at p. 425): B

"In this case, however, there was no physical change of possession of the goods. In point of law possession of goods may be changed by agreement without any physical change in their position, or in the position of the person who actually guards them. The right to possession may be transferred by agreement, and the character in which the custodian holds them may be changed by attornment. This was established by Reeves v. Capper (8), Meyerstein v. Barber (9), and Hilton v. Tucker (10); and in my opinion that which took place did amount in point of law to a change of possession of the goods. But the agreement by which this change in possession was effected was reduced into writing, and cannot be proved apart from the writing. Without the writing Charlesworth cannot prove his right to possess as against Wilson, the owner of the goods." C

"If the decision in Ex parte Hubbard (5) is extended to cases of pledges created by agreement, and without any physical change in the custody of the goods, the Bills of Sale Act will become of little, if any, use." E

In the present case it is essential, in order that the plaintiff's right may arise, that the goods should have come into his possession, that is, that they should be physically in his hands. In my opinion, therefore, the document is not void as a bill of sale. F

Libel—Justification—Plea in general terms—Particulars—Need of full and precise particulars of matters alleged in plea—Disclosure of names of witnesses—Discovery—Right to order before well-pleaded defence.

In an action for libel where the defamatory statement is of a general character and the defence is a plea of justification in general terms, particulars to support such a plea must be given stating specific instances with the same precision as in an indictment. The defendant cannot object to give such particulars on the ground that they will disclose the names of his witnesses, or on the ground that he should not be compelled to give particulars before getting discovery, since, ordinarily, a defendant cannot ask for discovery until there is a well-pleaded defence.

Appeal by the defendant from an order of the Divisional Court (CAVE and LAWRENCE, J.J.) affirming an order for further and better particulars made by MATHEW, J., at chambers.

The plaintiffs, who were husband and wife, brought this action for an alleged libel published by the defendant in "Truth." The libel contained many separate defamatory statements and, so far as is material, the defamatory statements were, that the plaintiffs were "charity swindlers" and "impostors" in respect of a "home" instituted and carried on by them; that the "home" was a "monstrous swindle"; and that the plaintiffs had "perpetrated frauds upon those who contributed money to the support of this monstrous swindle." The defendant pleaded a general justification that the statements complained of were true in substance and in fact. The plaintiffs applied at chambers for an order that the defendant should give particulars of his plea of justification, and KENNEDY, J., made an order that the defendant should give particulars of (inter alia) how and in what way the plaintiffs were "charity swindlers" and "impostors," and the home was a "monstrous swindle," and of the facts and matters relied on in support of such allegations, and when they occurred; also of the "frauds" which the plaintiffs "have perpetrated upon those who have contributed money to the support of this monstrous swindle," and of the "extent" thereof, and if he intends to rely upon particular instances of the persons so defrauded, and of the facts and matters relied on in support of such allegation, and when they occurred; and that, unless such particulars were delivered, the defendant should be precluded from giving any evidence in support of his plea of justification, or to the extent to which such particulars were not delivered.

"The plaintiffs, by the annual reports, prospectuses, and appeals issued by them to the subscribers and the public, represented the St. James's Home as a home for female inebriates, and invited subscriptions and donations for the home on the ground that it was a home for female inebriates, and such subscriptions and donations as were paid were paid upon the faith of that representation and invitation, whereas in fact the home was conducted and managed as a commercial undertaking and in such a way as to further the success of the undertaking rather than the welfare of the inmates, and so that the plaintiffs could benefit themselves by the carrying on of the home. . . . No proper system of books or accounts, showing the receipts and expenditure of the home, were kept, and no proper vouchers were submitted to the auditors for the purpose of preparing the annual balance sheets, and the balance sheets do not show the real or entire receipts or expenditure of the home, and the plaintiffs by means of the home were enabled to live free of expense to themselves, and they appropriated for their own purposes moneys received for or earned by the home, and they caused statements to appear in the annual balance sheets of the home of cash supplied by the female plaintiff and loans made by the male plaintiff which were not in fact supplied or lent out of their own moneys but in reality out of the moneys of the home; and the time when the aforesaid facts and matters occurred was the whole time the home had been open since its institution in 1876. The plaintiffs have obtained the whole of the subscriptions and donations received for the home by the false representations above stated, and by concealing from donors and subscribers the facts and matters stated above."

The plaintiffs applied for further and better particulars, and an order made by a master ordered that the defendant should give further and better particulars setting out the receipt of moneys appropriated by the plaintiffs for their own purposes and not accounted for as such, and of the persons from whom and the dates when such moneys were received, and in what way the expenditure of the home was not shown by the balance-sheets; and of the "frauds perpetrated upon those who have contributed money to the support of this monstrous swindle"; and it was ordered that unless the defendant delivered such particulars he should be precluded from giving any evidence in support of his plea of justification of which particulars were ordered. This order was affirmed by MATHEW, J., and by the Divisional Court, and the defendant appealed.

June 1, 1893. LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs have brought an action against the defendant charging him with having libelled them, and in

- A their statement of claim have set out that which is said to be the libel. The alleged libel is the publication of matter which contains many separate statements, each of which the plaintiffs say is libellous. The defendant has pleaded, not in respect of any separate statement, but as to the whole, that it is true in substance and in fact, that is a general justification. Thereupon the plaintiffs said that the defendant was bound to give particulars of his justification. The plaintiffs
- B might have taken out a summons asking for particulars generally, but they have said that they only desire particulars as to certain matters, pointing out what they are. Upon that the defendant made no objection to the application that he should give particulars. The plaintiffs, as to some of the statements complained of, are satisfied that the particulars which have been given are sufficient, but as to others, two in particular, they say that either no particulars at all have been given, or insufficient particulars, and that they are simply the same as saying over again that the defendant justifies. The plaintiffs, therefore, require further and better particulars. The defendant has taken several objections to this, and what we have to decide is whether the defendant is bound to give further particulars, and whether he is bound to give the further particulars which have been asked for. That is the question before us.
- D The defendant has raised a further point, and says that the particulars which have been given are sufficient, and that the plaintiffs have asked for too minute particulars; and then a still further point that, even though he must give the particulars asked for, he ought not to be ordered to give them now, but to be allowed to get discovery before pleading such particulars. We have to decide upon all these points. The defendant has pleaded a plea of justification to the whole
- E libel, and has not separated any part of the libel and said that, as to the rest of the libel, he does not justify. Strictly, therefore, the defendant is bound to prove a justification as to the whole, and, if he fails to justify every part of the libel, his plea is bad, and the plaintiff is entitled to damages as if there were no plea of justification. Perhaps that is too strict a view to take at the present day, because, now, if a defendant is charged with publishing a libel consisting of several statements, and the statements are separate, he might be allowed to separate them and to plead a separate plea of justification as to each or as to some of them. Taking that more lenient view, if one treats the separate statements as separate libels, the defendant may be allowed to say that he justifies as to each separate statement. In that case we must see what will be the result of saying that further particulars must be given of the plea of justification of one or more of the statements.
- G That a general plea of justification of a libel is insufficient without particulars has been settled law from early times. In J'Anson v. Stuart (1), which is the leading case upon this point, the headnote is as follows (1 Term Rep. 748):
- "To print of any person that he is a swindler is a libel, and actionable. A justification of such a charge must state the particular instances of a fraud by which the defendant means to support it."
- H If you call a man a swindler, and he sues you for libel, you cannot plead merely that he is a swindler, and such a plea is bad if the particular circumstances of fraud are not set out. In that case ASHURST, J., says (1 Term Rep. at p. 752):
- "When he took upon himself to justify generally the charge of swindling, he must be prepared with the facts which constitute the charge in order to maintain his plea; then he ought to state those facts specifically, to give the plaintiff an opportunity of denying them, for the plaintiff cannot come to the trial prepared to justify his whole life."
- I That passage in the judgment supports the headnote. Then, also, BULLER, J., really says the same, and I will not read his judgment. That is the leading case upon this subject. At that time it was necessary to put the particulars in the plea itself. Afterwards the rules of pleading were enlarged and a defendant was allowed to plead generally in his plea; but he was not allowed to go to trial upon such a plea if the plaintiff desired to have particulars, but was bound to give particulars to the same extent as he was formerly bound to plead particulars in the plea. The defendant was bound "to state those facts specifically to give the plaintiff an opportunity of denying them." Almost precisely the same rule upon this subject was laid down by PARKE, B., in Hickinbotham v. Leach (2), where he says (10 M. & W. at p. 363):

"It is a perfectly well established rule in cases of libel or slander, that, where the charge is general in its nature, the defendant, in a plea of justification, must state some specific instances of the misconduct imputed to the plaintiff. That is settled by J'Anson v. Stuart (1), Newman v. Bailey (3), and Holmes v. Catesby (4)."

In the same case ALDERSON, B., during the argument, said (ibid.): "the plea ought to state the charge with the same precision as in an indictment." That is to say, the particulars, if not in the plea of justification, must be as precise as would be necessary in the case of an indictment. Treating, therefore, the statement in this libel with which we have to deal as if it were a separate statement and justified separately, we must now see if sufficient particulars have been given.

The defendant has said that the plaintiffs are "charity swindlers"; that is a general statement; he has been asked to give particulars, that is, for particular instances of swindling. The defendant gives particulars as follows:

"The instances are that they appropriated for their own purposes moneys received for or earned by the house, and that they caused statements to appear in the annual balance sheets of loans, etc."

Is that sufficient? No doubt the defendant thereby states that he means to justify in that way. No instances whatever are given. Those particulars are almost as general as the plea itself; no names, no dates, and no figures are given. Those particulars are not sufficient. In the old days, if it did not give sufficient instances, the plea was bad; according to the practice of the present day, if the particulars do not give sufficient instances the plea is bad as to that part of the libel. Being, therefore, of opinion that the statements in these particulars are not sufficiently precise as to the instances, we must agree with the Divisional Court that further particulars must be given to entitle the defendant to justify these statements, and that, if he does not give sufficient particulars, then the plea of justification as to that part of the libel is bad, and the defendant cannot justify as to that part at the trial, so that as to that part the action will be undefended. I am, therefore, of opinion that, particulars being now given in place of the instances which were formerly necessary to make a plea of justification good, these particulars must now be given in the way in which they have been ordered, and that the defendant, if he does not give sufficient further particulars will be shut out from his defence of justification as to that part of the libel.

It has been urged that the particulars which the plaintiff asks for are too minute, and that the defendant if he gives them must give the names of his witnesses. If these particulars are such as the defendant ought to give, he cannot object to give them because they will disclose the names of his witnesses. There is, therefore, nothing wrong in asking for those particulars. It may be that the defendant cannot give all the names, but we have only to say whether the order is a right order; the defendant, when he answers, must give all the names which he knows; if he can swear that he does not and cannot know some of them, then will be the time to say whether he will be excused from doing so. I think that the particulars ordered are not too minute.

Then we come to the main question. The defendant must somehow or other give the particulars. It has been argued that he ought not to be compelled to give them now, but that he ought to be allowed to get discovery by means of interrogatories and inspection of documents before he is called upon, in effect, to plead. This is a case where no relation existed before the action between the plaintiff and the defendant which would entitle the defendant to any discovery. There is not any relation of principal and agent, or of partners, or of trustee and cestui qui

A trust; there is not any relation whatever between the parties except that of plaintiff and defendant in an action of tort. Can the defendant, under those circumstances, be entitled to discovery before he has fixed the issues by his pleading? I am of opinion that he cannot. Generally speaking, neither a court of equity nor a court of common law would order discovery to be made before pleading, where no relation existed between the parties which would authorise the making of such an order, merely for the purpose of enabling a party to find out whether he had any case or not. In such a case they would be called fishing interrogatories and fishing discovery. They were never allowed except under very special circumstances, such as when one party was keeping back something which the other side ought to know. In this case the plea is a bad plea, and in effect is no plea at all, and therefore the rule that no discovery can be had until there is a good plea upon the record, or a good cause of action shown by a plaintiff, applies. Here the plea of justification, from want of sufficient particulars, is not a good plea of justification, and, therefore, a plea by the defendant justifying the libel—that is, a general plea with particulars—has not yet been well pleaded as a defence. Until there is a well-pleaded defence the defendant cannot ask for discovery at all as to this separate libel. No special or particular circumstances under which discovery should be allowed have been proved or alleged. It is, therefore, wrong to say that the obligation upon the defendant to give particulars does not arise until he has obtained discovery. I think that, both upon principle and authority, the defendant's contention, that he is not bound to give the particulars now, is untenable.

A case was cited—Leitch v. Abbott (5)—decided by COTTON and BOWEN, L.JJ., which is said to show the contrary, and that a new rule of law is the result of the Judicature Acts. In that case there was a relation between the parties before action which did authorise an order for discovery; that is pointed out in the judgment, and the judgment is founded upon the fact that such a relation did exist. That case, then, is no authority against the rule which I have stated, but is in consonance with it, and shows that there must, generally speaking, be some previously existing relation between the parties to entitle a party to obtain discovery before pleading. The decision of the Divisional Court was right and this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Master of the Rolls has stated the law applicable to this case so lucidly and fully that I will not add anything.

KAY, L.J., read the following judgment. The argument in this case, in one view of it, seems to involve the question whether mere suspicion can justify a libel. It is urged that the so-called particulars, which are in terms as general as the libel complained of, ought not to be made more definite at present because, until the defendant has obtained discovery from the plaintiff, he may not be able to give particulars in any better form. The defendant in a libel action may plead a justification; but it is no justification to plead simply that the alleged libel is true. That, as has been pointedly said, is not justification, but is merely repeating the libel: J'Anson v. Stuart (1). Accordingly the practice required that the plea should state facts which justified the defendant in publishing the language complained of. This is clear from the decision in Hickinbotham v. Leach (2), and the authorities referred to in that case—Jones v. Stevens (6), Newman v. Bailey (3), J'Anson v. Stuart (1), and Holmes v. Catesby (4).

I It is said that the modern practice is not to state the facts relied on as a justification in the pleading; but to add them in particulars. I presume this is done under R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 6 and r. 7; but then the particulars should be as explicit as the plea was required to be before. If the defendant says that he is unable to state any such facts without discovery, the answer is simple and conclusive, that he ought not to have published the libel, and cannot plead any justification for having done so.

The case of a charge of fraud against an agent, or a breach of trust against a trustee, by pleading only, where no libel has been published otherwise, is essentially different. There the fiduciary relation, and the circumstance that the facts are generally known only to the defendant, or at least that he has means of knowledge not in the first instance equally accessible to the plaintiff, may justify the court in requiring the defendant to make discovery before the plaintiff is called on to give particulars because the fiduciary relation of the defendant to the plaintiff entitles the plaintiff to all the knowledge which the defendant may have, and it is not uncommon, when a conflict arises between the right of the plaintiff to discovery and the right of the defendant to particulars, in such cases to postpone the giving of particulars until the discovery has been made: Leitch v. Abbott (5); Sachs v. Spielman (7). But to apply this practice to the case of libel would be to sanction the publication of a libel, when the libeller knew no facts justifying the libellous statement, because he believed he could, by the process of discovery, elicit such facts.

It is urged that, if the facts are stated before discovery is given, the discovery will be limited to those particular facts so alleged. I am not satisfied that this will necessarily be so. I can conceive a case in which a libel in general terms may be justified by certain facts stated in the particulars, and that there may be power to obtain discovery of other analogous facts which may support the justification. But, even if it were so limited, that is no reason why the particulars should not be as definite or explicit as the defendant can make them. It seems to me a much less evil, if it be an evil, to confine the discovery to the particular facts adduced as a justification, than to give the smallest sanction to a libel unsupported by facts which justify the publication. There is another obvious reason for requiring precise particulars, namely, that the plaintiff may know the case he has to meet, etc., what acts it is alleged have been committed which justify the general charge against him; but this is a consideration not peculiar to libel cases.

I am of opinion that the particulars complained of are too general; that they are not particulars at all, but a mere repetition of part of the libel, and that further and better particulars ought to be given. There remains the question whether the penalty, if better particulars are not given, is not as it now stands, too large. A libellous statement, as to which no particulars are given, ought not to be allowed to be justified at all. But where some facts are stated in the particulars by way of justification, which may or may not be sufficient, it is argued that the defendant should not be prevented from relying on them at the trial, simply because he has added a general statement which in itself is not sufficient. However, I am not satisfied that this argument applies in the present case. I do not think that any facts are stated as a justification in this case as to the particulars complained of, and, therefore, the penalty imposed is not too large.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—Of course I did not intend, in anything which I said, to impugn in any way the propriety of a defendant, in such a case as this pleading the general plea of justification; and if the plaintiff were not to ask for particulars, he could not afterwards complain that the plea was only general. The plaintiff must ask for particulars, as, under the old system, if a plea of justification was general, and the plaintiff did not demur, but pleaded over, then the plea would have been a sufficient plea, and could not have been objected to at the trial.

Landlord and Tenant—Yearly tenancy—Termination—Notice to quit terminating on anniversary of commencement of tenancy.

By an agreement in writing dated May 19, 1890, the landlord agreed to let a beerhouse to the tenant "as yearly tenant commencing on May 19, 1890, at the clear yearly rent of £45, the sum of £4 7s. 6d. as the apportioned part up to June 24 next being paid on the signing thereof, and the future rent to be paid by equal quarterly payments in advance if demanded on the usual quarter days." On Nov. 17, 1893, the landlord gave the tenant notice to quit the premises "on May 19 next."

Held: on the construction of the agreement the tenancy commenced on May 19, 1890, and not on June 24, 1890; there was no distinction between tenancies which commenced, "at," "on," "from" or "on and from" a particular date; it was immaterial whether the letting was from one of the usual quarter days or from some other day; and, although a six months' notice to quit on May 18 would have been correct, the notice to quit on May 19, the anniversary of the day on which the tenancy commenced, was valid.

Appeal by the plaintiff landlord from a decision of BRUCE, J., in an action of ejectment brought by the landlord against the tenant, the principal question being whether the notice to quit was valid or not. Judgment was given for the tenant.

By an agreement in writing dated May 19, 1890, between the landlord Thomas Sidebotham and the tenant Ellen Holland, the landlord agreed to let and the tenant to take the beerhouse known as the Grapes Inn, at Weaste, Salford, as yearly tenant commencing on May 19, 1890, at the clear yearly rent of £45, the sum of £4 7s. 6d. as the apportioned part up to June 24 next being paid on the signing, and the future rent to be paid by equal quarterly payments in advance if demanded on the usual quarterly days of payment, the first payment being considered as due in advance if demanded on June 24 next, and each succeeding quarterly payment to become payable in advance if required upon the first day of such quarter. On Nov. 17, 1893, the tenant was served with the following notice bearing that date: H

"As solicitor for . . . your landlord, I hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up the peaceable and quiet possession to him on May 19 next of the Grapes Inn and premises in your occupation, . . . and which you now hold of him as tenant under agreement dated May 19, 1890." I

The tenant refused to quit, and the present action was brought. The tenant relied upon the following grounds: (i) that, in consideration of her advancing £100 to

- A the landlord in September, 1892, he promised that, although she was but a yearly tenant, she should remain in possession until November, 1893; (ii) that by the agreement the tenancy commenced on June 24, and that the six months' notice served on Nov. 17, 1893, to quit on May 19, 1894, was more than a month prior to June 24, and therefore bad; (iii) that, if the tenancy commenced on May 19, as the landlord alleged, the notice to quit was equally invalid, because it was not
- B a notice to quit expiring upon the last day of some year of the tenancy.

McCall, Q.C., and Roskill for the landlord.

J. W. Mansfield and E. F. Spence (Shee, Q.C., with them) for the tenant.

Dec. 20, 1894. LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment with which LORD

- C HALSBURY concurred. The express statement in this agreement, that the tenancy is to commence on May 19, is too clear and unambiguous, to warrant any inference which might otherwise have been drawn from the stipulation that the rent is to be paid by equal quarterly payments in advance if demanded on the usual quarter days. In the absence of any express statement as to the commencement of the tenancy, it might have been held to commence on June 24: see Doe d. Holcomb v. Johnson (1); Sandill v. Franklin (2). It is true that, if the tenancy commences on May 19, the last quarterly payment to be made in advance on the previous Lady Day will not be a full quarter's rent, but only a proportionate part of it—viz., an apportioned part of it for the time which will intervene between Lady Day and May 19. But this circumstance only shows that the agreement is not very accurately drawn. The inaccuracy does not justify the conclusion that
- D the tenancy did not commence on the day expressly mentioned for its commencement—viz., on May 19, 1890—and that the time which intervened between that day and June 24, was not part of the tenancy.

Treating the tenancy, then, as commencing on May 19, 1890, the question is whether a notice to quit on May 19, 1894, given by the landlord on Nov. 17, 1893, is a good notice. It is a six calendar months' notice to quit on the anniversary

- F of the day on which the tenancy commenced. Why, then, is it bad? The notice is said to be bad because it expires one day too late. The contention is that, as the tenancy commenced "on" May 19, and not "from" May 19, the notice should have been to quit on May 18, and not on May 19. Having regard to the decision in Clayton's Case (3), I think that, although the agreement was signed on May 19, and the tenant can hardly in fact have been in possession the whole of that day,
- G yet, in point of law that day must be treated as the first day of the tenancy and as part of the term for which the house was agreed to be let. The tenancy cannot, therefore, be treated as commencing on May 20 to the exclusion of May 19. One year from that day would expire at midnight of the next May 18: see R. v. St. Mary, Warwick (4); Ackland v. Lutley (5). If, therefore, notice to quit on May 18 were given, it would no doubt be good. Indeed, it is well settled that a
- H notice ought to expire on the last day of the current year: see Right d. Flower v. Darby (6); Doe d. Robinson v. Dobell (7). But, although a half-year's notice to quit on May 18 would be correct, it does not follow that a notice to quit on May 19, which is the anniversary of the day on which the tenancy commenced, is bad, and I am clearly of opinion that it is not.

I have looked at all the decisions which were referred to in the argument and at many more, and I can find none in which it has been held that a half-year's notice to quit on the anniversary of the day on which the tenancy commenced is bad. I should be very much surprised to find such a case. The validity of a notice to quit ought not to turn on the splitting of a straw. Moreover, if hypercriticisms are to be indulged in, a notice to quit at the first moment of the anniversary ought to be just as good as a notice to quit on the last moment of the day before. But such subtleties ought to be, and are, disregarded as out of place.

There are several decisions in which notices like the present have been held sufficient. In Kemp v. Derrett (8) a yearly tenancy began on Oct. 29; it was determinable at any time on a three months' notice to quit. LORD ELLENBOROUGH A said (3 Camp. at p. 511):

"I am quite clear that the notice should have expired on Jan. 29, April 29, July 29, or Oct. 29."

Again, in Doe d. Cornwall v. Matthews (9) a yearly tenancy commenced on May 7, 1850; a six months' notice to quit on May 7, 1851, was held good. The rent was payable quarterly, but none was ever paid. Roe d. Durant v. Doe (10) and Papillon v. Brunton (11) are again cases in which the tenancy began on (or perhaps from) a usual quarter day; the notice was to quit on the anniversary of that day, and the notice was held good. In those cases a notice to quit on the day before the anniversary would be bad: see Page v. More (12). In Right d. Flower v. Darby (6) and Morgan v. Davies (13) the notices were too short, and were bad on that ground, but no one suggested that they were bad because they were notices to quit on the anniversary of the day on which the tenancy commenced. In Page v. More (12) a notice to quit on the right day was bad; but it was given by the landlord, and it was to quit at noon, which was too soon. B

In BLYTHEWOOD AND JARMAN'S CONVEYANCING (4th edn.), vol. 3, at p. 276, the rule is thus laid down: C

"It—i.e., the notice to quit—must generally be a half-year's notice, and must expire at the period of the year at which the tenancy commenced; and it is immaterial whether the letting was from one of the general quarter-days or from any other day." D

For these propositions several authorities are cited, the more important of which I have noticed when considering the validity of a notice to quit given in time and expiring on the anniversary of the commencement of a tenancy. I can find no distinction ever drawn between tenancies commencing at a particular time or on a particular day or from the same day. "At," "on," "from," or "on and from" are for this purpose equivalent expressions. Any distinction between them for such a purpose as this is far too subtle for practical use: see Doe d. Strickland v. Spence (14). In an action for double rent it is, however, necessary to be more particular: see Page v. More (12). So it is when the number of days has to be counted. In the absence of authority compelling me to decide differently, I hold the objection that the notice was bad because it was a notice to quit on May 19, instead of May 18, is untenable. E

Then it was said that where the tenancy is not from one of the usual quarter-days there must be 183 clear days between the day on which the notice is given and the day on which the tenancy expires. There were, however, 183 days in this case if the time is reckoned in the usual way—that is, counting in one of the extremes and excluding the other; and I can find no case which decides that both extremes must be excluded. In WILLIAMS' NOTES TO SAUNDERS' REPORTS (5th Edn.), vol. 1 at p. 276 c, it is said that a half-year's notice must consist of 182 days, except when the rent is payable on the usual quarter feast days, when notice on one feast day to quit on the next but one is sufficient. If 182 days' notice are enough, it is plain that this notice was long enough. F

Lastly, it was urged that the notice was bad because the landlord had promised for valuable consideration not to turn the tenant out before 1895. This is the tenant's real defence to this action. Unfortunately, however, the promise was a verbal one; it was not to be performed within a year, and the Statute of Frauds, 1677, s. 4 [see now the Law Reform (Enforcement of Contracts) Act, 1954] precludes the tenant from enforcing it. Under these circumstances it is impossible to hold the notice bad on this ground. G

An argument was advanced that this verbal agreement created a new lease until November, 1895, and that the term created by the written agreement of 1890 was impliedly surrendered. But it is familiar law that whether an agreement operates as a demise or as an agreement only depends on the intention of the parties. In this case it is plain that no new lease was ever thought of or intended by either H I

A party, and it would not be right to invent one in order to get the tenant out of the difficulty in which the absence of a written agreement places her. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed, and judgment be entered for the landlord, with costs here and below.

B A. L. SMITH, L.J., stated the facts and the grounds of defence and read the following judgment. As to the first defence, the tenant though denying the promise, also set up the Statute of Frauds, 1677, and if ss. 1, 2, and 4 of that statute had been pleaded in the reply instead of only s. 4 (though, from the course this case took at the trial, it must, I think, be treated as if all three sections had been pleaded), the point upon the statute is a good one, and BRUCE, J., was right in deciding against the tenant upon this point.

C As to the second ground of defence, I am of opinion that BRUCE, J., was mistaken in holding that the tenancy commenced on June 24, 1890. He appears to have arrived at this conclusion notwithstanding the express terms of the agreement that the defendant should become tenant "as yearly tenant commencing on May 19, 1890," because he thought that, if he held otherwise, the tenant being under obligation to pay rent in advance, she might have to pay rent between May 19 and June 24, when she had been turned out on May 19. But it has been pointed out that the Apportionment Act, 1834, would apply; and even if it did not, as a six months' notice was necessary, when the quarterly rent payable in advance became due, the tenant would obviously refuse to pay rent for the period during which the notice to quit would prevent her occupying the premises, viz., between May 18 and June 24. I cannot doubt that under the agreement by its express terms the tenancy commenced on May 19, 1890. I cannot hold, as I was invited to do by counsel for the landlord, that when a written agreement states that a person shall become a yearly tenant "commencing on May 19," that it means that he shall become such tenant "commencing on the day after May 19th" or, in other words, as the landlord contends, "commencing from May 19."

F This being so, the third defence arises, which is certainly technical, viz., that, although a full six months' notice to quit has been given for May 19, which was the anniversary of the day upon which the tenancy commenced, it is nevertheless a bad notice to quit, because it is not a notice expiring on the last day of the year of the tenancy, but upon the day after. It appears, upon looking into the old authorities, that at one time what was to be considered a reasonable notice to quit was not settled, but subsequently it became settled law that in cases of yearly tenancies half a year's notice, expiring at the period of the year at which the tenancy commenced, was the reasonable notice to be given, and in Doe d. Shore v. Porter (15) LORD KENYON, over one hundred years ago, laid it down that a tenant from year to year cannot be dispossessed without a six month's notice ending at the expiration of a year of his tenancy; and, indeed, I take this to be familiar knowledge. It has also been settled that the notice to quit must be given half a year before the expiration of the then current year of the tenancy, except when the rent is payable on one of the usual feast days, in which case what TINDAL, C.J., in Roe d. Durant v. Doe (10) calls "a customary" half-year's notice, will suffice, if given on or before one of the feast days in the earlier half of the tenancy, to quit on the feast day at the conclusion of the tenancy, though there may be fewer than 182 days between the two feast days. No point was taken in that case, nor as far as I have been able to discover in any other of the cases upon feast day tenancies, that the notice was bad because it terminated upon the anniversary of the commencement of the tenancy; but the point taken was, that the tenant had not had a full six months' notice. Morgan v. Davies (13) deals with these feast days tenancies, and is to the like effect.

I The complaint in the present case is not that too few days have been allowed to elapse between the giving of the notice upon Nov. 17, 1893, for May 19, 1894, for that is not the fact; but it is said that, as the tenancy commenced on May 19, the notice does not expire upon the last day of the year of the tenancy, for as it commenced upon May 19, it expired at midnight upon May 18. It was held in Doe d. Spicer v. Lea (16) that where a notice to quit at New Michaelmas would be good because the tenancy had then commenced, it was bad if given for Old Michaelmas, which was twelve days later than New Michaelmas, though it had been given in ample time for New Michaelmas, LORD ELLENBOROUGH observing that, if it might be given for Old Michaelmas instead of New Michaelmas, it might as well be given for any other time. In Doe d. King v. Grafton (17) LORD CAMPBELL in giving judgment stated (18 Q.B. at p. 501) that,

"on an ordinary yearly letting the six months' notice must expire at the end of the year;"

and ERLE, J., said (ibid. at p. 502):

"The authorities determine that, where premises are taken on a yearly tenancy, the term must expire with the year."

That case does not necessarily determine the question whether a notice for the anniversary of the day upon which the tenancy commenced is, or is not, a good notice to quit.

I can find no case, nor has any been cited, in which a full six months' notice to quit, given on the anniversary of the day upon which the tenancy commenced, has been held to be invalid, and, indeed, Kemp v. Derrett (8) and Doe d. Cornwall v. Matthews (9) are to the contrary effect so far as they go. In the first case LORD ELLENBOROUGH held that, when a person became tenant on Oct. 29, 1810, a notice to quit on Oct. 29 was good; and in the latter case Doe d. Holcomb v. Johnson (1) is referred to by JERVIS, C.J., where it was held that although the tenant entered in November, as he had paid the rent from that date to the following Christmas, and afterwards at Midsummer and Christmas, the tenancy commenced from Christmas, and the notice to quit at Christmas was good. But I must point out that in neither of these cases was there a written agreement stating when the tenancy commenced, the only statement being that they commenced on the respective days, and the inference drawn was that the tenancies commenced from that day. There is no place for any such inference in the present case, for the agreement is express upon the point. It cannot be denied that the law relating to notices to quit is highly technical, but the technicalities are too deeply rooted in our law to be now got rid of, and if any case had been found showing that a full six months' notice to quit, given as in the present case for the anniversary of the day of the commencement of the tenancy, was bad, I must have given effect to it; but, as no such case has been found, I do not desire to add one more technicality to a notice to quit unless compelled to do so.

I would point out that the plaintiff has only himself to blame for the difficulties he is in in the present case. Had he added the words which are very ordinarily inserted in a notice to quit, "or at the expiration of the year of your tenancy which shall expire next after the end of one half-year from the service of this notice," and which are inserted to avoid such a point as that now taken, all would have been in order; but the words are not there. If the notice to quit in this case had been for May 20 or May 21, or any later date, I should have had no doubt but that it was a bad notice, and I own that the inclination of my opinion is that the present notice is bad because it does not expire upon the last day of some year of the tenancy; but, as LORD HALSBURY and LINDLEY, L.J., are of opinion that, inasmuch as this is a full six months' notice to quit upon the anniversary of the day upon which the tenancy commenced, it is good, though the tenancy expired at midnight the day before, I yield to what they say, and will not differ from

A them and hold that this unmeritorious technicality must prevail. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

D [CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), July 5, 1894]

[Reported [1894] 3 Ch. 671; 63 L.J.Ch. 845; 71 L.T. 222;

E Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Covenant against act amounting to annoyance—Annoyance to neighbour—Erection of trellis-work screen along wall between properties.

By a lease dated Nov. 11, 1878, and made in pursuance of a building scheme, the plaintiff demised to A. B. a piece of ground for 99 years together with a dwelling-house which had been erected on it by A. B., who covenanted that he, "his executors, administrators, and assigns, would not, without the licence and consent in writing of the lessor . . . for that purpose first obtained, erect or build, or cause or permit to be erected or built, upon the said piece of ground, or upon any part thereof, any other building whatsoever . . . and also that he . . . would not do or suffer to be done on the said premises or any part thereof any act, matter, or thing which might be or become an annoyance, nuisance, or disturbance to the neighbourhood or to any tenant of the lessor." The land was ultimately assigned to the defendant. By a lease, dated Sept. 14, 1881, the plaintiff demised a piece of land, adjoining that demised to A. B. to R. G., who covenanted for himself and his assigns to erect a dwelling-house on the land within 21 years, and also entered into covenants similar to those in A. B.'s lease. The premises were ultimately assigned to F. N., who in 1893 built a house overlooking the defendant's garden. The defendant thereupon erected a hoarding, or trellis-work screen, nearly 60 feet long and 20 feet high, close to the partition wall on his own side and about eighteen feet from the nearest part of the house built by F. N. The plaintiff brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from permitting the hoarding to remain erected.

I Held: (i) the hoarding or screen was a "building" within the meaning of the covenant, though the case was somewhat near the border line; and (ii) the erection of the structure was an "annoyance" within the meaning of the covenant to F. N., a tenant of the lessor; the plaintiff was, accordingly, entitled to an injunction.

Action for an injunction.

In 1878 the plaintiff, Edward Wood, the tenant for life of a freehold estate at Faling, Middlesex, with power to grant building leases, began to carry out a building scheme on the estate. A form of building lease was used, but it was subject to variations to suit particular cases. By an indenture dated Nov. 11, 1878, the plaintiff demised to Alfred Bailey, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for a term of 99 years from Michaelmas Day, 1878, a piece of ground lying on the west side of Woodville Road, a new road running north and south through the estate, with a dwelling-house on it, which had been erected by the lessee, and Bailey covenanted for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, with the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, and also as a separate covenant with the person or persons for the time being in remainder expectant on the determination of the term, their heirs and assigns (the "lessor parties"), that he D

"would not, without the licence and consent in writing of the lessor parties for that purpose first obtained, erect or build, or cause or permit to be erected or built upon the said piece or parcel of ground hereby appointed and demised, or upon any part thereof any other building whatsoever, save and except a stable and coach-house [which might be erected as therein mentioned] and also that he . . . would not do or suffer to be done on the said premises or any part thereof, any act, matter, or thing which might be or become an annoyance, nuisance, or disturbance to the neighbourhood or to any tenant of the lessor parties." E

By an indenture of July 3, 1879, the demised premises were assigned to Richard Grice for the residue of the term, subject to the lessees' covenants, and by an indenture of Sept. 2, 1887, to the defendant, subject to the covenants. By an indenture of Sept. 14, 1881, the plaintiff demised to Grice, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for a term of 99 years from Michaelmas Day, 1881, a further piece of ground, part of the said estate, and situate on the west side of Woodville Road, and immediately adjoining the northern boundary of the land comprised in the lease of Nov. 11, 1878, the lease containing a covenant by Grice, for himself and his assigns, to erect one dwelling-house on the demised land within twenty-one years, at a cost of at least £1,200, or two dwelling-houses at a cost of at least £800 each, according to plans and on sites to be approved by the lessor's architect. The lease also contained covenants by the lessee similar to those covenants in the lease of Nov. 11, 1878. By an indenture of April 27, 1888, Grice assigned the hereditaments comprised in the lease of September, 1881, to George Nesbit, who on Oct. 22, 1892, assigned them to Frederick Neale for the residue of the term subject to the lessee's covenants in the lease. In 1893 Neale obtained the approval of the lessor's architect to his plans for a house to be built, and completed the house in January, 1894. There were several windows in the side of Neale's house next G

A to the defendant's garden, and overlooking it, the boundary wall between the two properties being about 17 feet from the nearest part of Neale's house, and over 30 feet from the main wall of it. The house was occupied by Neale's family on Feb. 26, 1894, and on the next day the defendant began erecting a hoarding, or trellis-work screen, nearly 60 feet long and nearly 20 feet high on his side of the boundary wall separating his garden from Neale's, and about 18 feet from the nearest projecting part of Neale's house, and 32 feet from the south main wall thereof, and, though warned to desist, completed it.

B The plaintiff brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from erecting or permitting to remain erected on the premises demised by the lease of Nov. 11, 1878, any hoarding, screen, or other erection so as to be an annoyance, nuisance, or disturbance to the neighbourhood or to Neale or any other tenant of the plaintiff, and from otherwise committing a breach of any of the lessee's covenants contained in the said lease.

D ROMER, J.—In my opinion what the defendant has done is a breach of his covenant, or a covenant that is binding upon him, in two respects. In the first place, although the case is somewhat on the border line, I come to the conclusion that what the defendant has put up—this screen—is a building within the meaning of the covenant which binds the lessee, not without the licence and consent in writing of the lessors, the parties to the lease, being first obtained,

E “to erect or build, or cause or permit to be erected or built, upon the said piece or parcel of ground hereby appointed and demised, or upon any part thereof, any other building whatsoever, save and except a stable and coach-house.”

F This screen is a very substantial erection, and a firm one. It seems to me that it is intended to be, and unless restrained would remain, a permanent part of the wall, close to which or against which it is erected. At any rate, it will act in the same way, as far as the plaintiff's house is concerned, as if it had been a wall added to a portion of the former existing wall. I think, undoubtedly, if it had been built of brick it would have been admitted to be a breach of the covenant, and I do not think the fact that it is made of wood, under the circumstances, makes any difference. As I have said, it is a permanent erection, and a substantial one, and intended to act as such. I think, under the circumstances, that it is a breach of the covenant to which I have just referred.

G In the second place, I have no doubt whatever in my own mind that it is a breach of the covenant that the lessee

H “will not do or suffer to be done on the premises any act, matter, or thing which might be or become an annoyance . . . to any tenant of the lessor.”

I To my mind, undoubtedly, what the defendant has done is an annoyance to Mr. Neale, the tenant of the lessor. I think, in the first place, that it does substantially interfere with the access of light to the windows on the ground floor of this building, and that notwithstanding some parts of the expert evidence; and I feel satisfied beyond that, and irrespective of that, that it causes an annoyance to Mr. Neale, the tenant, within the meaning of the words used in the covenant. It falls within the definition of the word “annoyance” in a covenant like this, which was given by the three lords justices in Tod-Heatley v. Benham (1).

In the first place, to adopt the language of CORRON, L.J. (40 Ch.D. at p. 94), I am satisfied by the evidence before me that reasonable people having regard to the ordinary use of the Neales' house for pleasurable enjoyment, would be annoyed and aggrieved by what has been done by the defendant—it would be an annoyance and a grievance to reasonably sensible people. It is an act which is an interference with the pleasurable enjoyment of the house, as stated by COTTON, L.J. Then, A to adopt the words of LINDLEY, L.J. (ibid. at p. 96), I think it does raise an objection in the minds of reasonable men, and is an annoyance within the meaning of the covenant. It raises objections within the minds of reasonable men; and, to adopt the language of BOWEN, L.J. (ibid. at p. 98), I think it is

“a thing which reasonably troubles the mind and pleasure, not of a fanciful B person, or of a skilled person who knows the truth, but of the ordinary sensible English inhabitant of a house—if you find there is anything which disturbs his reasonable peace of mind, that seems to me to be an annoyance, although it may not appear to amount to physical detriment to comfort.”

I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that this is a clear breach of the last-mentioned covenant, as well as of the first, and on both grounds I think the plaintiff C is entitled to succeed. The simple form will be to order the defendant to pull it down—you do not ask for damages, of course—and to pay the costs.

Practice—Writ—Specially endorsed writ—“Unliquidated demand”—Inclusion in endorsement of claim for interest—R.S.C., Ord. 3, r. 6—Ord. 14, r. 1.

A writ was endorsed under R.S.C., Ord. 3, r. 6, with a claim for a sum of money with interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum from the date of the writ until payment or judgment, but it did not state that the interest was due under a statute or any contract between the parties.

Held: the plaintiff was not seeking only to recover a debt or liquidated demand, and, therefore, the writ was not specially endorsed to enable him to obtain judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1. H

Notes. R.S.C. 1883, Ord. 3, r. 6, has been amended, and now provides that a writ may be specially endorsed in any action in the Chancery Division or Queen's Bench Division unless it includes a claim for libel, slander, malicious prosecution, I

Cur. adv. vult. E

Feb. 20, 1892. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., read the following judgment of the court.

SHEBA GOLD MINING CO., LTD. v. TRUBSHAWE

The plaintiffs in this case sue for a balance of £3,514 15s. 5d. for goods sold. The writ bears a special endorsement to that effect, which, after stating the balance due, proceeds as follows: "Place of trial, London. (Signed) Ashurst, Morris, Crisp & Co." After this signature came the following words: F

"The plaintiffs also claim interest on the sum of £3,514 15s. 5d. from the date of this writ till payment or judgment at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum; and the sum of £3 3s. (or such other sum as may be allowed on taxation) for costs. If the amount claimed is paid to the plaintiffs or their solicitors or agents within four days from the service thereof, further proceedings will be stayed." G

Application has been made for judgment under Ord. 14 for the sum of £3,514 15s. 5d., together with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. from the date of the writ until judgment. The affidavits make it clear that the claim for interest is not made upon any contract to pay interest. It is no doubt founded upon the supposition that the endorsement of the claim for interest operates as a demand under the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 28. H

It is admitted on both sides that this view cannot be sustained in view of the decision in Rhymney Rail. Co. v. Rhymney Iron Co. (1), and that in this case no interest is in fact recoverable. The affidavits make it equally clear that the plaintiffs' advisers supposed that they could recover interest, that it was intended to recover it, and that judgment was asked not only for the balance due for goods, but for interest from the date of the writ—and for interest which, if recoverable, was in the nature of unliquidated damages. Order 14 applies only when the defendant has appeared to a writ specially endorsed under Ord. 3, r. 6. We think it clear that Ord. 3, r. 6, applies only to cases in which the demand which the plaintiff seeks to recover, whether or not it be made up in part of interest, is a liquidated demand; in other words, to cases in which the interest is payable under I

A a contract and not by way of unliquidated damages. It was so held under words almost identical with those now under consideration, contained in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852: Rodway v. Lucas (2). If any distinction can be drawn between the two enactments, it is that the words of Ord. 3, r. 6, are rather more clearly in favour of such a construction than those of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. When, therefore, the plaintiffs' affidavits put it beyond controversy that they were intending and hoping to recover in this action unliquidated damages on account of interest, it seems at first sight difficult to see how it can be said that in this action they are "seeking only to recover" a liquidated sum.

It has been strenuously argued, however, that the only test of what they are seeking to recover is the form of the writ itself, and that the portion of the endorsement on the writ which claims the interest is no part of the "special endorsement," which ends with the signature of the plaintiffs' solicitors following the mention of the place of trial. Each of these propositions must be examined, and it will be more convenient to take the second proposition relating purely to the matter of form first. The argument is based upon the final words of the rule, which say that the "special endorsement shall be to the effect of such of the forms in Appendix C, s. 4, as shall be applicable to the case." The forms given in Appendix C, s. 4, all end, it was said, with the signature of the solicitor, and, therefore, the "special endorsement" goes no further, and what follows does not prevent the writ from being "specially endorsed," under Ord. 3, r. 6.

We think there is a fallacy in this argument. The forms given in Appendix C, s. 4, are the forms of statements of claim generally, and are not adapted as they stand for endorsement on a writ. Every one of them ends with "delivered," which when filled up, would be "delivered by Messrs. A. and B., solicitors for the plaintiff on" such a day; words inapplicable to an endorsement on the writ. Appendix A, No. 2, gives the form of a specially endorsed writ, which after the signature proceeds "and the sum of £— (or such sum as may be allowed on taxation) for costs." "If the amount, etc." Indeed, it is clear from forms 1 and 2 of Appendix A that such an endorsement as "The plaintiff also claims interest on £3,514 15s. 5d. from the date of this writ, etc.," is no formal part of any writ at all, whether specially endorsed or not. If, therefore, any effect is to be given to it, it must be considered as part of the endorsement, and to be taken into account in determining whether it answers the description of a proper "special endorsement," although it comes after the signature. We think this is the true way of looking at it. How can it be discarded altogether? In many cases it is a very important element in the claim. The notice that the defendant may stop the action by payment within four days clearly embraces it within the expression "the sum claimed," and we think it would be a return to the worst features of a system in which form was preferred before substance if we were to say that so important a demand was to be treated as non-existent because it happened to be a kind of postscript to the rest of the claim, instead of preceding the signature.

H We treat it, therefore, as an essential part of the endorsement. So regarded, we think that the claim in the present case departs from the requirements of a special endorsement in two respects. (i) It does not show that the interest is claimed as being due by contract. (ii) No definite sum is claimed.

All the forms given in Appendix C, s. 4, in which interest is claimed, are cases of interest due either by express covenant or upon bills or notes. By s. 57 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the last mentioned interest is to be deemed liquidated damages; and we think that a statement of claim which demands interest, but shows no legal liability to pay it, is upon general principles defective. Again, all the forms claiming interest mention the specific sum claimed. We think this is as it should be. It is important that a man who is to be proceeded against summarily for judgment should know exactly how much he has to pay if he wishes to stay the action, and should not be called upon to take the risks of calculation. A claim for interest which is not thus specific departs in a material and important respect from the forms to which a special endorsement is required to conform.

Elliott v. Roberts (3) and Blood v. Robinson (4) do not profess to be fully reported, A but we take them to have proceeded upon the same lines as the foregoing remarks, and to be entirely in harmony with the view we have expressed.

So much for the question of form. It is satisfactory to have solid grounds of B substance for coming to the same conclusion. We think that the question what a plaintiff "seeks to recover" is not, upon an application for judgment under Ord.
14, concluded necessarily by the endorsement on the writ, especially if it be ambiguous. In Rodway v. Lucas (2) the endorsement was undistinguishable from that in the present case. The application there was to set the judgment aside.
The court held that—after judgment at any rate—the endorsement was capable of being construed as covering the case of interest due under a contract, and, there being no affidavit of merits, refused to set the judgment aside; but they added that, if a case should arise in which the special endorsement should be resorted to, C
although the interest was in fact claimable only as damages, they would set aside the judgment with costs as an abuse of the process of the court. In other words, the court would disregard the form and look to the substance, and if satisfied upon the affidavits that, however correct the claim might be in form, the case was one in which the plaintiff had no business to treat the interest as a liquidated demand, and attempt to get the benefit of the special endorsement, they would prevent him D from resorting to a remedy to which he was not entitled. It seems to us that the present case falls precisely within this principle. No one suspects the advisers of the plaintiffs of an intention to strain or misapply the process of the court, but it is plain from their own affidavits that they have in fact been attempting to get judgment under Ord. 14 for unliquidated damages in the shape of interest. It E matters not in such a case whether the writ be right or wrong in form. It is not a case in which they have any business to resort to Ord. 14, and they must take the consequences.

RYLEY v. MASTER

This case is governed by the decision in Sheba Gold Mining Co., Ltd. v. Trubshawe. F That which professes to be the special endorsement shows no liability to pay interest, and claims no definite and specific sum. Ord. 14 is not applicable.

DOBBS v. BRAIN AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.), May 31, June 2, 1892]

Administration of Estates—Administration bond—"Well and truly administer"—Legacy to infant—Loss of legacy to estate—Liability of sureties.

By a will a legacy of £50 was bequeathed to an infant. Letters of administration with the will annexed were granted to two administratrices, who, with the defendants as sureties, executed an administration bond, by which the administratrices were bound to "well and truly administer" the personal estate and effects of the deceased, "that is to say, pay the debts of the deceased which he did owe at his decease, and then the legacies contained in the said will . . ." The whole of the estate was duly administered by A., to whom the administratrices had entrusted administration, with the exception of £50 for the legacy to the infant, with which A. disappeared. The bond was then assigned by order of the Court of Probate to the plaintiff as guardian for the infant, who brought an action against the sureties for the due administration of the estate to recover the legacy.

Held: since the £50 had become lost to the estate, there had been a breach of the condition of the bond to well and truly administer, which rendered the sureties liable.

Appeal from a decision of POLLOCK, B., at the trial of the action without a jury.

By his will dated Oct. 4, 1879, Jacob Curtis bequeathed a legacy of £50 to Florence Emily Probert, then and at the date of the action an infant. On his death letters of administration with the will annexed were granted in January, 1880, to his two daughters, Lucina Wellington and Hannah Maria Tingle, who executed an administration bond, which the defendants also executed as sureties. The administratrices employed their brother-in-law, Allen, to carry out the administration of the estate, and the whole of the estate was distributed and the debts and legacies paid with the exception of the legacy of £50. Allen then went to America taking the £50 and it was not known what had become of him or the money. In July, 1890, the bond was assigned by the court to the plaintiff as guardian of the infant legatee, who brought an action against the sureties for the due administration of the estate to recover the legacy. The bond was in a form drawn up under s. 81 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, and the condition of it was that if the administratrices do,

"When lawfully called on in that behalf, make or cause to be made a true and perfect inventory of all and singular the personal estate and effects of the deceased which have or shall come to their hands, possessions, or knowledge, and the same so made do exhibit or cause to be exhibited . . . and the same personal estate and effects do well and truly administer (that is to say) do pay the debts of the deceased which he did owe at his decease, and then the legacies contained in the said will annexed to the said letters of administration so to them committed, as far as the personal estate and effects will thereto extend, and the law charges thereon, and further do make or cause to be made, a true and just account of their said administration when they shall be thereunto lawfully required, and all the rest and residue of the said personal estate and effects shall deliver and pay unto such person or persons as shall be by law entitled thereto, then this obligation to be void and of no effect or else to remain in full force and virtue."

POLLOCK, B., held that no breach of the bond had been proved and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case an action has been brought on an administration bond against the sureties on the ground of an alleged breach of the conditions of the bond by the administratrices. They did not know much about what they had to do, and entrusted the matter to their brother-in-law, and though I do not wish to find fault with them for so doing, they may have thereby incurred a legal liability. He administered the estate, and took £50, which was to be paid to an infant legatee, but which he has clearly not paid over. He went to America, and it is not known where he is, so that the £50 with which he was entrusted as agent of the administratrices is lost to the estate. The rest of the estate has been paid away, and none of it is left in the administratrices' hands. The bond has been assigned to a proper person, and the question is whether, under these circumstances, an action is maintainable against the sureties. That question depends on the true construction of the bond.

A The bond is one that has been drawn up by a judge of the Probate Division under the Court of Probate Act, 1857, and was intended to carry out the provisions of that Act. The intention was to enforce the carrying out of the duties of an administrator, and to ensure the protection of persons interested in the estate; in other words, the bond was intended to carry out s. 81 of the Act of 1857, which provides that every person to whom any grant of administration shall be committed shall give bond to the judge of the Court of Probate

“with one or more surety or sureties, conditioned for duly collecting, getting in, and administering the personal estate of the deceased, which bond shall be in such form as the judge shall from time to time by any general or special order direct.”

C Taking those words of the Act alone, do they include the duty of keeping the estate, after it is got in, till it is duly administered? In my judgment they certainly do, and the intention of the bond is to enforce that duty, and guard persons who are interested in the estate by means of having sureties to the bond.

Coming now to the construction of the bond, I think that it should be interpreted so as to carry out the objects of the statute. The condition of it is, that the

“do make or cause to be made a true and perfect inventory of all and singular the personal estate and effects of the said deceased, which have or shall come to their hands, possession, or knowledge, and the same do exhibit.”

If that should not be done, there would be a breach, and the sureties would be

E liable. The bond then goes on thus,

“and the same personal estate and effects do well and truly administer.”

That assumes that the estate has been collected, and an account taken of it, and then it is to be truly administered, and those words, standing alone, include, I apprehend, the duty of keeping the estate until it is truly administered. Then comes the order in which the estate is to be administered, the debts of the deceased, then the legacies as far as the personal estate and effects will thereto extend, and the law charges thereon, and then the residue is to be distributed. What is the meaning of that? It refers to “the same personal estate” as was mentioned before, and was intended to show the way in which due administration is to take place. The bond is a statutory one, drawn up in order to carry out the objects

G of an Act of Parliament, and it should be construed so as to carry out those objects. It seems, therefore, to me, that part of the duty of the administrator is to take proper care of the personal estate that he has collected until it has been distributed, and if he pays away any part of it so as to be unable to administer duly by distributing the estate in the appointed order, I think he has committed a breach of the duties imposed on him by the bond.

H Is there any authority in support of that statement? I think that Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson (1), which has been referred to, is an authority for that proposition. It is true that, in the judgment, LORD LYNCHURST, C.B., states the fact of the administrator's having become bankrupt after distributing part of the estate; but in the part of the judgment where the law is laid down, that fact is not relied upon. The question may perhaps arise some day, whether distribution

I of the estate otherwise than in the appointed order is a breach of the bond in a case where enough property exists to pay all claimants against the estate; but that question does not arise in this case. Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson (1) is an authority for this proposition, that the moment part of the estate is paid away so that all legacies which will become due cannot be paid, there is a breach of the duty to duly administer, and, if the bond is then assigned, an action may at once be brought either against the administrator or a surety. To hold otherwise would place people who have rights under a will in a position of great danger, and would be contrary to the intention of the statute. It cannot be good law to allow an administrator to use the property of the deceased to speculate with on the Stock Exchange, and to say that, if he should lose it, he has committed no breach of duty as regards a legatee whose legacy is not due, on the ground that by the time that the legacy is due the money may be recovered by another speculation. Therefore, I think, in accordance with Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson (1), that the plaintiff has proved a breach of the condition of the bond, and that this action was rightly brought. I cannot agree with the judgment of POLLOCK, B., and I think that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff.

FRY, L.J.—I wish, in the first place, to consider the nature of the bond. It has four conditions: first, that the administratrices shall make, or cause to be made, a true and perfect inventory of all the personal estate and effects of the deceased which shall come into their possession or knowledge; secondly, that they shall administer the same; thirdly, that they shall make a true and just account of their administration when required; and fourthly, that they shall pay over the residue to the person or persons entitled thereto. We are mainly concerned with the second, the words of which are,

“and the same personal estate and effects do well and truly administer (that is to say), do pay the debts of the deceased which he did owe at his decease, and then the legacies contained in the said will annexed to the said letters of administration so to them committed as far as the personal estate and effects will thereto extend.”

With regard to the payment of the legacies, the true result of the bond is that the administrator is bound to pay them out of the personal estate of the deceased in due course of administration. Therefore, payment out of the personal estate of the deceased is part of the due administration of the estate. There is only one other reference to the bond that I wish to make. Though it is much like the form of bond given under the Statute of Distributions (1670), yet there are differences; for instance, the administration under the present form is rather more free than under the old one.

But I will now turn to the facts of the present case. The administratrices were two ladies, and the whole of the estate of the deceased was collected and came into the possession of one of them. Fifty pounds was set aside for the legacy which is the subject of this action, and after payment of the debts and the other legacies the residue was distributed. The £50 was entrusted to their brother-in-law who has gone to America taking it with him, so that the whole of the deceased's personal estate has gone. Consequently the payment of this legacy is not in any way secured on the attainment of her majority by the legatee. Is it a due course of administration of the estate to distribute the whole of it without providing for the payment of this legacy when it becomes due? The answer must be that it is not. Neither do I think that payment of this legacy by the administratrices out of their own money when it becomes due would be a due administration of the estate. Under these circumstances, I am, therefore, of opinion that there has been a breach of the condition of the bond. With regard to the latter point it was argued that there is no distinction between the estate of the deceased in the possession of the administrator and the private property of the administrator. Though the administrator is the legal owner of both, yet there is a difference between them in the eye of the law, and the conversion of the deceased's estate would be a legal wrong. The conclusion we have arrived at is strongly confirmed by Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson (1), where LORD LYNCHURST, C.B., delivering the judgment of the court, says (1 Cr. & M. at p. 712):

“When the administrator applies and converts to his own use the effects of the intestate, so that those effects are entirely lost to the estate of the intestate, that is such a breach of the condition of the bond, by which the administrator undertakes ‘well and truly to administer according to law,’ as will entitle the next-of-kin to have the bond put in use at their instance.”

A That has occurred here, as the administratrices have so applied the effects of the deceased that this sum of £50 has been lost to the estate.

There is only one other point that I wish to refer to. It may be said that our reasoning is defective because the infant may die and her legacy therefore never become payable. The answer is, that the legacy is not contingent but a vested one; but, even if it were contingent, the right to the money would, on the infant's death, vest in the next-of-kin; and the same breach would have occurred. I, therefore, think that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. One of the obligations of this bond is that the administratrices shall well and truly administer the estate of the deceased, and pay the legacies by which this legacy of £50 is included. As a matter of fact, the administratrices handed the £50 over to Allen, and no one knows where he is or where the £50 are. The whole of the rest of the estate has been administered, and as this £50 has passed from the power of the administratrices, there has been a misapplication of the assets of the deceased, and, therefore, a breach of the duty imposed by the bond well and truly to administer the estate. Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson (1) seems to me to apply here, though the form of bond there used differs slightly from that in present use. The words used by LORD LYNCHURST, C.B., are applicable. He says (1 Cr. & M. at p. 708):

“The main question under these circumstances is this: Was this conduct of the administrator a breach of that part of the condition of the bond by which he undertook ‘well and truly to administer the effects of the intestate’? Now, looking at the language of the bond, nothing can be more distinct and precise than those terms of the condition. They are that he shall well and truly administer according to law the effects which shall come to his hands, and all other the effects of the intestate that shall come to the hands of any person or persons for him to be administered. It would seem difficult to entertain any doubt upon the natural construction of these words, and nothing would be a more direct infringement of the terms of the condition than the application of the effects of the intestate to his own use, and the converting them to his own purposes, so that they should be entirely lost to the estate of the intestate.”

Here the £50 have been lost to the estate of the deceased, and the fact of the bankruptcy of the administrator in that case is, I think, immaterial. It was argued that there can be no breach of the condition of the bond until the time for the payment of the legacy had arrived; but, under the words “well and truly administer,” a duty arises on the part of the administratrices to take care of the legacy until the time arrives for its payment. Then it was contended that the words “that is to say” control and limit the preceding words. In my opinion this is not so, and the following words are merely illustrative of the preceding words. It was also argued that money provided aliunde when the time arrived for the payment of the legacy would be sufficient; but in my opinion this would not do, and I think there has been a breach of the duty to take care of the personal estate of the deceased which came into the hands of the administratrices, and to pay the legacy out of that same personal estate. I agree that the decision of the court below must be reversed, and judgment should be entered for the plaintiff.

Originating Summons.

By her will, dated Dec. 6, 1890, Sarah Allen Abbott devised and bequeathed to her executors and trustees, T. Peacock and H. A. Dowse, all her real and personal estate on trust to sell and convert, and, after payment thereof of her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies and annuities thereby given, to invest the residue as therein mentioned; after giving certain specific legacies, she bequeathed to her stepson, S. T. Abbott, an annuity of £50 a year during

A his life for his maintenance, conditional on his not returning to Europe or until he should assign, or otherwise lose the personal benefit of it or any part thereof, with power to the trustees in their uncontrolled discretion to pay or to withhold payment of the annuity as they thought fit and without being compelled to give any reason for the exercise of the discretion. The testatrix bequeathed a legacy of £3,500 to each of the eleven children of her late husband, Samuel Abbott, such legacies not to be paid to any step-child being a son who had not completed his twenty-fifth year; and she gave the ultimate residue to her sister, Mrs. Matilda Whitehead, for her life and after her death as she might by will appoint.

Mrs. Abbott died on Jan. 18, 1892, and her will was proved on Feb. 17, 1892. At the date of her death there were seven children of Samuel Abbott being sons under the age of twenty-five years, of whom one, E. H. Abbott, had since attained that age.

C By an order dated June 3, 1892, the court declared that, on the true construction of the will of Mrs. Abbott, and in the events which had happened, the legacies given to the sons of Samuel Abbott, except to one son, S. J. Abbott, carried interest from the date of the sons respectively attaining the age of twenty-five years, or the expiration of one year from the date of the death of the testatrix, whichever should last happen. The residue of the estate was sufficient to answer the legacies given to the sons. All the other legacies given by the will had been paid.

D By her will, dated Feb. 3, 1892, after appointing T. Peacock and H. A. Dowse executors and trustees, and bequeathing certain legacies and annuities, Mrs. Whitehead devised, bequeathed, and appointed (such appointment being expressed to be made in exercise of the powers given to her by Mrs. Abbott's will) her residuary, E real, and personal property, to her trustees on trust for sale and conversion and investment, to hold it, after providing for debts and legacies and annuities, on trust, to pay the income thereof to Rosa Ellen Lucas, the wife of William Lucas, for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death on trust for such one or more of her children by her present or any future husband as she should by deed or will appoint, and in default of and in so far as any appointment should not extend, in trust for all her children equally. The testatrix directed her trustees to invest the residue of her estate in such securities as should be by law permitted, and authorised them to retain existing investments. Mrs. Whitehead died on Nov. 19, 1892, and her will was proved on Jan. 20, 1893. Mrs. Lucas had two infant children. She had not executed the power of appointment given to her by the will of Mrs. Whitehead. The estate of Mrs. Whitehead was sufficient to pay the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and to provide for the legacies and annuities given by the will.

G The executors and trustees of Mrs. Whitehead's will took out a summons for a declaration whether the following interests over which the testatrix had a power of appointment by will under the will of Mrs. Abbott as part of the residuary estate of Mrs. Abbott were to be treated as capital or income of the residuary estate of Mrs. Abbott: (a) the interim income of a fund held by the executors to meet the six legacies of £3,500 each, which were vested at Mrs. Abbott's death but were payable only as the legatees respectively attained the age of twenty-five, and did not carry interest in the meanwhile; and (b) the unapplied income from time to time of the fund held by the executors to meet the discretionary annuity of £50 a year.

I Sankey for the executors and trustees.
R. Dodd for Mrs. Lucas.
Fossett Lock for the children of Mrs. Lucas.

STIRLING, J.—In this case two questions arise under the will of Mrs. Whitehead. They both relate to funds derived by her under the will of Mrs. Abbott. The first and more important question relates to the income of the fund set aside by the executors of Mrs. Abbott's will to meet the six legacies of £3,500 [His LORDSHIP stated the provisions of the will with reference to those legacies, and continued:] Mrs. Abbott gave the residue of her property to Mrs. Whitehead, who thus became entitled to the income of the amount of the legacies till each of the step-sons attained the age of twenty-five, which has not happened yet as regards most of them. Mrs. Whitehead, therefore, had under the will a terminable interest in the income of the legacies which she could dispose of by her will; she made her will, and gave her residuary estate to Mrs. Lucas for life, with remainder to her children. The question is, whether the income accruing from the funds set apart to answer these legacies, and which, it is not disputed, passed under the gift of the residue of Mrs. Whitehead's estate, is income to go to the tenant for life under her will, or capital which ought to be invested, and the income only arising from the investments paid to the tenant for life.

I have been referred to cases where it has been held that the income of a fund set apart to answer contingent legacies, ought to be treated as income as between a tenant for life and remaindermen. I need only refer to one of them, Allhusen v. Whittell (2), where a fund had been set apart to meet contingent legacies, and it was contended that the income of that fund fell into the residue as income, and not as capital. Wood, V.-C., in giving judgment, says (L.R. 4 Eq. at p. 303):

"As regards the contingent legacies, there is a great deal of force in the argument that, if these legacies become payable, they are like any other legacies no longer residue; and being no longer residue, the tenant for life ought not, upon principle, to be entitled to the income of the fund set apart to meet them, any more than to the income of any other part of the fund which may be necessary for the payment of any other legacy."

The Vice-Chancellor, therefore, was plainly of opinion that, as regarded other legacies, that is vested legacies, this doctrine did not apply. He goes on to say (ibid. at pp. 303, 304):

"I am not sure that the courts, in some of the authorities cited, have sufficiently adverted to this reasoning; and whether they have not too narrowly followed words rather than things when they said that this income is income of residue, because when it comes to be taken out it is no longer residue. However, I think I am bound by authority, and, upon principle, I consider the question as analogous to the cases like Sitwell v. Bernard (4) and others, where the court has been obliged, for the sake of not deferring to inconvenient periods the distribution of property, as it were to intervene and cut the knot. I apprehend the principle may be rested upon this, that the fund is residue until it is wanted; and if it be said that it ceases to be residue when it is not wanted, that rule may be a very simple one in one case, and a very complicated one in another."

That was undoubtedly directed to a case where the legacies were contingent, and the reasoning was based upon the fact of the contingency, and, so far as I can judge from the language of the Vice-Chancellor, he seems to have been of opinion that if the legacies had been vested his reasoning would not have applied. It seems to me that the reasoning as regards a fund set apart to meet contingent legacies does not apply in the present case where the legacies are vested, and I must treat the case as if the second testatrix, Mrs. Whitehead, had been entitled to a terminable annuity of a like amount as the interest of the fund set apart for the legacies. If that is so, the principle of Crawley v. Crawley (1) applies, and the fund must be dealt with in the same way as the fund in that case, and the interest which accrues on the fund, until the legatees respectively attain twenty-five years, must be treated as capital and invested, and the tenant for life under Mrs. Whitehead's will can only receive the income arising from the investments. I cannot see anything in Mrs. Whitehead's will which prevents that principle from applying. [Hrs LORDSHIP referred to the residuary clause of Mrs. Whitehead's will, and continued:]

A Reliance was placed by counsel for Mrs. Lucas on the trust for the benefit of Mrs. Lucas, which preceded the trusts limited to her for life with remainder to her children. That gift might, if she had had no children, have taken effect upon the principle of Lassence v. Tierney (5), but it does not seem to me to affect the reasoning which I think that the fund in this case should be dealt with. Then again it was said that the clause in the will which empowered the trustees to allow the

B testatrix's estate to remain in the state of investment in which it was at her death, showed that the intention was that Mrs. Lucas should enjoy the income as income, and in support of that I was referred to Re Thomas, Wood v. Thomas (6), before KEKEWICH, J. In my opinion, that case does not apply to the present. Under the clause in question the trustees would, no doubt, be justified in retaining the terminable annuity, but the clause is an administrative one only, and cannot affect

C the rights of the parties. This fund must be dealt with in the way I have indicated, and I answer the first question by saying that the income of the fund is to be treated as capital and invested, and the income only of these investments paid to Mrs. Lucas.

Then there is the question as to the unapplied income of the fund set apart to meet the contingent annuity, payable at the discretion of Mrs. Abbott's executors.

D [HIS LORDSHIP referred to that clause in Mrs. Abbott's will, and continued:] Subject to the payment of the annuity, the sum set apart to meet it forms part of Mrs. Abbott's residuary estate, and will pass under the gift of the residue in Mrs. Whitehead's will. As pointed out during the argument, this question is covered by Cranley v. Dixon (3), and the surplus income of the fund, if any, after providing for the annuity, must be paid to the tenant for life, and need not be

E capitalised. The costs of all parties must come out of Mrs. Whitehead's residuary estate.

Conflict of Laws—Foreign land—Title—Trespass—Jurisdiction of English courts.

English courts have no jurisdiction to adjudicate on a claim to a title to foreign land or on one for damages for trespass on foreign land.

Per LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.: It is quite true that in the exercise of the undoubted jurisdiction of the courts it may become necessary incidentally to investigate and determine the title to foreign lands, but it does not seem to me to follow that because such a question may incidentally arise and fall to be adjudicated upon the courts possess, or that it is expedient that they should exercise, jurisdiction to try an action founded on a disputed claim of title to foreign lands.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (FRY and LOPES, L.JJ., LORD ESHER, M.R., dissenting), reported [1892] 2 Q.B. 358, reserving a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (LAWRANCE and WRIGHT, JJ.).

G The appellants, the British South Africa Co., were an English company, incorporated by Royal Charter in 1889, and the respondents, the Companhia de Moçambique, were a company founded at Lisbon in 1888 under the law of Portugal, and the other respondents were officers of that company. The respondents brought an action against the appellants for alleged trespasses on, and wrongful acts relating to their property in South Africa. The defence was that the High Court of Justice had no jurisdiction to adjudicate in such an action. In the Queen's Bench Division LAWRENCE and WRIGHT, JJ., held that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain an action brought against a person resident in England for damages for trespass on lands situated out of England where there was no court of competent jurisdiction, and gave judgment for the present appellants. The Court of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls dissenting, held the contrary, and gave judgment in favour of the respondents.

1 Cohen, Q.C., Lord Robert Cecil and Hollams for the appellants.
Sir Henry James, Q.C., Bompas, Q.C., and T. W. Chitty for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.
 Sept. 8, 1893. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The principal question raised by the appeal is whether the Supreme Court of Judicature has jurisdiction to try an action to recover damages for a trespass to lands situated in a foreign country. It is not in controversy that, prior to the Judicature Acts no such jurisdiction could have been exercised; but it is asserted on behalf of the respondents that the only barrier to its exercise was the technical one that the venue in such a case must be local, and that the rules made under the Judicature Acts, which have abolished local venues, have removed the sole impediment which prevented the courts entertaining and adjudicating on cases of this description. This contention has been sustained by a majority of the Court of Appeal, reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, with which, however, the Master of the Rolls agreed. A

The nature of the controversy between the parties renders it necessary to consider the origin of the distinction between local and transitory actions, and the development of the law which determined the venue or place of trial of issues of fact. It was necessary originally to state truly the venue—that is the place in which it arose—of every fact in issue, whether those on which the plaintiff relied, or any matter stated by way of defence; and if the places were different, each issue would be tried by a jury summoned from the place in which the facts in dispute were stated to have arisen. After the statute, 16 & 17 Car. 2, c. 8, which provided that, C

“after verdict judgment should not be stayed or reversed for that there was no right venue, so as the cause were tried by a jury of the proper county or place where the action was laid,” D

the practice arose, which ultimately became regular and uniform, of trying all the issues by a jury of the venue laid in the action, even though some of the facts were laid elsewhere. When juries ceased to be drawn from the particular town, parish, or hamlet where the fact took place, that is, from among those who were supposed to be cognisant of the circumstances, and came to be drawn from the body of the county generally, and to be bound to determine the issues judicially after hearing witnesses, the law began to discriminate between cases in which the truth of the venue was material, and those in which it was not so. E

This gave rise to the distinction between transitory and local actions that is, between those in which the facts relied on as the foundation of the plaintiff's case have no necessary connection with a particular locality and those in which there is such a connection. In the latter class of actions the plaintiff was bound to lay the venue truly; in the former he might lay it in any county he pleased. It was, however, still necessary to lay every local fact with its true venue, on peril of a variance if it should be brought in issue. Where a local matter occurred out of the realm, a difficulty arose, inasmuch as it was supposed that the issue could not be tried as no jury could be summoned from the place, and it was by the general rule essential that a jury should be summoned from the venue laid to the fact in issue. It was, however, early decided that, notwithstanding the general rule, such matters might be tried by a jury from the venue in the action, and thus the difficulty was removed and the form was introduced of adding after the statement of the foreign place the words “To wit at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex,” or whatever else might happen to be the venue in the action. F
H

The point arose in the 30 & 31 Eliz. [1587-8], cited in Dowdale's Case (1) (6 Co. Rep. at p. 47 b.), in an action of assumpsit, on a policy of assurance. The plaintiff declared that the defendant at London

“did assure that such ship should sail from Melcomb Regis, in the county of Dorset to Abville, in France, safely, and that the said ship in sailing towards Abville, scilicet in the river of Soome in the realm of France, was arrested by the King of France.” I

The parties came to issue whether the ship was so arrested or not, and this issue was tried before the Chief Justice in London, and found for the plaintiff. It was moved in arrest of judgment that this issue, arising from a place without the realm, could not be tried, and, if it could, it was contended that the jury should come from Melcomb, “for by common intendment they may have the best knowledge

A of the arrest." But it was resolved that the issue should be tried where the action was brought, it being said :

"Here the promise was made here in London, which is the ground and foundation of the action; and, therefore, there is in this case of necessity it shall be tried, or otherwise it should not be tried at all."

B It is, I think, important to observe that the distinction between local and transitory actions depended on the nature of the matters involved, and not on the place at which the trial had to take place. It was not called a local action because the venue was local, or a transitory action because the venue might be laid in any county, but the venue was local or transitory according as the action was local or transitory. It will be seen that this distinction is material when the Judicature

C rule, upon which so much turns, comes to be examined. I cannot but lay great stress upon the fact that while lawyers made an exception from the ordinary rule in the case of a local matter occurring outside the realm for which there was no proper place of trial in this country, and invented a fiction which enabled the courts to exercise jurisdiction, they did not make an exception where the cause of action was a local matter arising abroad, and did not extend the fiction to such cases.

D The rule that in local actions the venue must be local did not, where the cause of action arose in this country, touch the jurisdiction of the courts, but only determined the particular manner in which the jurisdiction should be exercised; but where the matter complained of was local, and arose outside the realm, the refusal to adjudicate upon it was in fact a refusal to exercise jurisdiction, and I cannot think that the courts would have failed to find a remedy if they had regarded the matter as one within their jurisdiction, and as one upon which it was proper for them to adjudicate.

The earliest authority of importance is Skinner v. East India Co. (2). The House of Lords in that case referred it to the judges to report whether relief could be obtained in respect of the matter mentioned in the petition, either at law or in equity, and if so in what manner. The judges answered (6 State Tr. at p. 719) :

F "that the matters touching the taking away of the petitioner's ship and goods, and assaulting of his person, notwithstanding the same were done beyond the seas, might be determined upon by His Majesty's ordinary courts at Westminster. And as to the dispossessing him of his house and island, that he was not relievable in any ordinary court of law."

G Notwithstanding the opinion thus expressed, LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., in Mostyn v. Fabrigas (3), entertained and acted on the view that where damages only were sought in respect of a trespass committed abroad, an action might be maintained in this country, although it was one which would here be a local action. He referred to two cases which had come before him. One was an action against Captain Gambier for pulling down the houses of some sutlers. Objection was

H taken to the action founded on the case just referred to of Skinner v. East India Co. (2). LORD MANSFIELD overruled the objection on the principle that the reparation was personal and for damages, and that otherwise there would be a failure of justice, for it was on the coast of Nova Scotia where there were no regular courts of judicature, and, if there had been, Captain Gambier might never go there again, and, therefore, the reason of locality in such an action in England did not

I hold. The other case was that of Admiral Palliser, who was sued for destroying fishing huts on the Labrador coast, where, it was said, there were no local courts, and, therefore, whatever injury had been done there by any of the King's officers would have been altogether without redress if the objection of locality would have held. The consequence of that circumstance showed (said LORD MANSFIELD, 1 Cowp. at p. 181) that

"where the reason fails, even in actions, which in England would be local actions, yet it does not hold to places beyond the seas within the King's dominions."

It does not appear clear from the language used by LORD MANSFIELD that he would have regarded a trespass to land committed beyond the seas and outside the King's dominions as within the cognisance of our courts. A

The view acted on by LORD MANSFIELD in the two cases referred to has not been followed. It came before the Court of Queen's Bench for consideration in Doulson v. Matthews (4), which was an action of trespass for entering the plaintiff's house in Canada and expelling him therefrom. The decisions of LORD MANSFIELD were relied on by the plaintiff, but the action was held not to lie. BULLER, J., in delivering judgment, said (4 Term Rep. at p. 504): B

"It is now too late for us to inquire whether it were wise or politic to make a distinction between transitory and local actions; it is sufficient for the courts that the law has settled the distinction, and that an action quare clausum fregit is local. We may try actions here which are in their nature transitory, though arising out of a transaction abroad; but not such as are in their nature local." C

In saying that we may not try actions here arising out of transactions abroad which are in their nature local, I do not think that the learned judge was referring to the mere technical difficulty of there being no venue in this country in which these transactions could be laid, but to the fact that our courts did not exercise jurisdiction in matters arising abroad "which were in their nature local." Doulson v. Matthews (4) has ever since been regarded as law, and I do not think it has been considered as founded merely on the technical difficulty that in this country a local venue was requisite in a local action. D

"And even in superior courts themselves, where the subject-matter is such as to imply a local limit of jurisdiction, the exception is peremptory; there is no necessity for a dilatory plea, nor is the objection waived by pleading in chief. Thus, if an action of trespass to land situate abroad were brought in the Queen's Bench, the defendant need not plead a dilatory plea showing what court has jurisdiction; but if the foreign locality appeared upon the count he might demur; and if it did not appear he might plead in chief or bar a denial of the trespass (which would be assumed as alleged within the jurisdiction), and at the trial the plaintiff would be non-suited or lose the verdict; and whether upon demurrer or plea the ordinary judgment would be given for the defendant: Doulson v. Matthews (4)." F

It is clear that WILLES, J., regarded an action of trespass to land situate abroad as outside the local limit of jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench. G

The same learned judge, in Phillips v. Eyre (6), said (L.R. 6 Q.B. at p. 28):

"Our courts are said to be more open to admit actions founded upon foreign transactions than those of any other European country; but there are restrictions in respect of locality which exclude some foreign causes of action altogether, namely, those which would be local if they arose in England, such as trespass to land; and even with respect to those not falling within that description, our courts did not undertake universal jurisdiction." H

In The M. Mozham (7), where injury had been caused to a pier belonging to an English company, but situated in a Spanish port, the ship, by the alleged negligent navigation of which the damage had been caused, was arrested in Spain, but was released on an agreement with the owners that their liability should be determined by proceedings in the English courts. JAMES, L.J., said (1 P.D. at p. 109) that but for the agreement come to between the parties I

"very grave difficulties indeed might have arisen as to the jurisdiction of this court to entertain any action or proceedings whatever with respect to injury done to foreign soil."

A The distinction between matters which are transitory or personal and those which are local in their nature, and the refusal to exercise jurisdiction as regards the latter, where they occur outside territorial limits, is not confined to the jurisprudence of this country.

B STORY, in his work on the CONFLICT OF LAWS, s. 551, after stating that by the Roman law a suit might in many cases be brought either where property was situate or where the party sued had his domicile, proceeds to say that

C “even in countries acknowledging the Roman law, it has become a very general principle that suits in rem should be brought where the property is situate; and this principle is applied with almost universal approbation in regard to immovable property. The same rule is applied to mixed actions, and to all suits which touch the realty.”

In s. 553, STORY quotes the following language of VATTEL :

D “The defendant’s judge [that is, the competent judge] is the judge of the place where the defendant has his settled abode, or the judge of the place where the defendant is when any sudden difficulty arises; provided it does not relate to an estate in land, or to a right annexed to such an estate. In such a case, as property of this kind is to be held according to the laws of the country where it is situated, and as the right of granting it is vested in the ruler of the country, controversies relating to such property can only be decided in the State in which it depends. . . . It will be perceived that in many respects the doctrine here laid down coincides with that of the common law. It has been

E already stated, that by the common law personal actions, being transitory, may be brought in any place where the party defendant can be found; that real actions must be brought in the forum rei sitæ; and that mixed actions are properly referable to the same jurisdiction. Among the latter are actions for trespasses and injuries to real property which are deemed local; so that they will not lie elsewhere than in the place rei sitæ.”

F The doctrine laid down by foreign jurists, which is said by STORY to coincide in many respects with that of our common law, obviously had relation to the question of jurisdiction, and not to any technical rules determining in what part of a country a cause was to be tried. STORY was, indeed, regarded by one of the learned judges in the court below (LOPES, L.J., [1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 420) as sanctioning the view that our rules with regard to venue in the case of local actions offered the only

G obstacle to the exercise of jurisdiction in actions of trespass to real property. The passage relied on is as follows (s. 554):

H “LORD MANSFIELD and EYRE, C.J., held at one time a different doctrine, and allowed suits to be maintained in England for injuries done by pulling down houses in foreign, unsettled regions, namely, in the desert coasts of Nova Scotia and Labrador. But this doctrine has been since overruled as untenable according to the actual jurisprudence of England, however maintainable it might be upon general principles of international law, if the suit were for personal damages only.”

I By the words “untenable according to the actual jurisprudence of England,” I do not think STORY was referring to the rule which in this country regulated the place of trial in the case of local actions. Nor am I satisfied that either LORD MANSFIELD or STORY would have regarded an action of trespass to land as a suit for personal damages only if the title to the land were in issue and in order to determine whether there was a right to damages, it were necessary for the court to adjudicate upon the conflicting claims of the parties to real estate. In both the cases before LORD MANSFIELD, as I understand them, no question of title to real property was in issue. The sole controversy was whether the British officers sued were, under the circumstances justified in interfering with the plaintiffs in their enjoyment of it.

The question what jurisdiction can be exercised by the courts of any country

according to its municipal law, cannot, I think, be conclusively determined by a reference to principles of international law. No nation can execute its judgments, whether against persons or movables, or real property, in the country of another. On the other hand, if the courts of a country were to claim as against a person resident there, jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the title to land in a foreign country, and to enforce its adjudication in personam, it is by no means certain that any rule of international law would be violated. But in considering what jurisdiction our courts possess, and have claimed a right to exercise in relation to matters arising out of the country, the principles which have found general acceptance among civilised nations as defining the limits of jurisdiction, are of great weight. It was admitted in the present case on behalf of the respondents that the court could not make a declaration of title, or grant an injunction to restrain trespasses, the respondents having in relation to these matters abandoned their appeal in the court below.

But it is said that the court may inquire into the title, and if the plaintiffs and not the defendants are found to have the better title, may award damages for the trespass committed. I find it difficult to see why this distinction should be drawn. It is said, because the courts have no power to enforce their judgment by any dealing with the land itself, where it is outside their territorial jurisdiction. But if they can determine the title to it, and compel the payment of damages founded upon such determination, why should not they equally proceed in personam against a person who, in spite of that determination, insists on disturbing one who has been found by the court to be the owner of the property? It is argued that if an action of trespass cannot be maintained in this country where the land is situate abroad a wrong-doer by coming to this country might leave the person wronged without any remedy. It might be a sufficient answer to this argument to say that this is a state of things which has undoubtedly existed for centuries without any evidence of serious mischief, or any intervention of the legislature, for even if the Judicature rules have the effect contended for, I do not think it can be denied that this was a result neither foreseen nor intended.

But there appear to me, I confess, to be solid reasons why the courts of this country should in common with those of most other nations have refused to adjudicate upon claims of title to foreign land in proceedings founded on an alleged invasion of the proprietary rights attached to it, and to award damages founded on that adjudication. The inconveniences which might arise from such a course are obvious, and it is by no means clear to my mind that if the courts were to exercise jurisdiction in such cases, the ends of justice would in the long run, and looking at the matter broadly, be promoted. Supposing a foreigner to sue in this country for trespass to his lands situate abroad, and for taking possession of, and expelling him from them, what is to be the measure of damages? There being no legal process here by which he could obtain possession of the lands, the plaintiff might, I suppose, in certain circumstances, obtain damages equal in amount to their value. But what would there be to prevent his leaving this country after obtaining these damages, and repossessing himself of the lands? What remedy would the defendant have in such a case where the lands are in an unsettled country, with no laws or regular system of government, but where, to use a familiar expression, the only right is might? Such an occurrence is not an impossible, or even an improbable, hypothesis. It is quite true that in the exercise of the undoubted jurisdiction of the courts it may become necessary incidentally to investigate and determine the title to foreign lands, but it does not seem to me to follow that because such a question may incidentally arise and fall to be adjudicated upon the courts possess, or that it is expedient that they should exercise, jurisdiction to try an action founded on a disputed claim of title to foreign lands.

Reliance was placed on the decisions of courts of equity, as showing that our courts were ready, when no technical difficulty of venue stood in the way to adjudicate on the title to lands situate abroad. If the refusal of the common law courts to exercise jurisdiction in cases of the nature now under consideration, had

A been regarded as the result of a mere technical difficulty, I cannot help thinking that the courts of equity, which were, in early days at all events, keen to supplement the deficiencies of the common law when the requirements of justice were impeded by technical difficulties, would have found some means of affording a remedy. LORD MANSFIELD, in his judgment in Mostyn v. Fabrigas (3), refers to a case of an injury in the East Indies similar to that with which he had to deal

B in the case of Captain Gambier, in which LORD HARDWICKE in a court of equity had directed satisfaction to be made in damages. But in this exercise of jurisdiction he has not been followed by any judge of the Court of Chancery.

While courts of equity have never claimed to act directly upon land situate abroad, they have purported to act upon the conscience of persons living here. In Lord Cranstown v. Johnston (8), SIR R. P. ARDEN, M.R., said (3 Ves. at p. 182) :

C " Archer v. Preston (9), Lord Arglass v. Muschamp (10), and Lord Kildare v. Eustace (11), clearly show that with regard to any contract made, or equity between persons in this country, respecting lands in a foreign country, particularly in the British dominions, this court will hold the same jurisdiction as if they were situated in England."

D STORY, in his CONFLICT OF LAWS, ss. 544, 545, although he says that to the extent of the decision in Lord Cranstown v. Johnston (8) there may, perhaps, not be any well-founded objection, nevertheless expresses the view that the doctrine of the English Courts of Chancery on this head of jurisdiction seems carried to an extent which may in some cases not find a perfect warrant in the general principles of international public law, and, therefore, it must have a very uncertain basis as

E to its recognition in foreign countries so far as it may be supposed to be founded upon the comity of nations.

The decisions of the courts of equity do not, to my mind, afford any substantial support to the view that the ground upon which the courts of common law abstained from exercising jurisdiction in relation to trespasses to real property abroad was only the technical difficulty of venue. In Whitaker v. Forbes (12), where an action

F was begun before, but the demurrer was heard in the Court of Appeal after, the passing of the Judicature Acts, the question arose whether the plaintiff could recover against a defendant resident in this country the arrears of a rentcharge issuing out of lands in Australia. The opinion expressed by BLACKBURN, J., in the course of the appeal in that case was much relied on by the respondents. He said (1 C.P.D. at p. 53) :

G "I do not think that this case raises any question as to jurisdiction, though in some respects it has been argued as if it did. The case turns on the technical distinction between local actions, where the trial must be local and transitory actions, and the question is one of venue only."

It is unnecessary to consider whether in circumstances such as gave rise to the

H action of Whitaker v. Forbes (12), an action might, since the Judicature Rules came into force, be maintained in the courts of this country. I do not think the dictum of the learned judge in that case can be regarded as of any great weight in determining the question with which your Lordships have to deal.

The terms of R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 1 [see now Ord. 36, r. 10], which are relied on by the plaintiffs, are as follows: "There shall be no local venue for the trial of any

I action except where otherwise provided by statute." The language used appears to me important. The rule does not purport to touch the distinction between local and transitory actions, between matters which have no necessary local connection, and those which are local in their nature. It deals only with the place of trial, and enables actions, whatever their nature, to be tried in any country. But it is, in my opinion, a mere rule of procedure, and applies only to those cases in which the courts at that time exercised jurisdiction. It has been more than once held that the rules under the Judicature Acts are rules of procedure only, and were not intended to affect, and did not affect, the rights of parties. Thus in

Kendall v. Hamilton (13) it was suggested that the law laid down in King v. Hoare (14) had been altered by the Judicature Acts owing to the abolition of a plea in abatement. LORD CAIRNS, L.C., said (4 App. Cas. at p. 516):

"I am unable to agree to this suggestion. I cannot think that the Judicature Acts have changed what was formerly a joint right of action into a right of bringing several and separate actions. And although the form of objecting by means of a plea in abatement to the non-joinder of a defendant, who ought to be included in the action, is abolished, yet I conceive that the application to have the person so omitted included as a defendant ought to be granted or refused on the same principles on which a plea in abatement would have succeeded or failed."

Again, in Britain v. Rossiter (15), BRETT, L.J., said (11 Q.B.D. at p. 129):

"I think that the true construction of the Judicature Acts is that they confer no new rights; they only confirm the rights which previously were found to be existing in the courts either of law or equity."

According to the contention of the respondents in this case the rule under consideration had the effect of conferring upon them a right of action in this country which they would not otherwise have possessed. As I have already pointed out, a person whose lands, situate in this country, were trespassed upon, always had a right of action in respect of the trespass. The rules relating to venue did no more than regulate the manner in which the right was to be enforced. But, in respect of a trespass to land situate abroad, there was no right of action, for an alleged right which the courts would neither recognise nor enforce did not constitute any right at all in point of law.

I have come to the conclusion that the grounds upon which the courts have hitherto refused to exercise jurisdiction in actions of trespass to lands situate abroad were substantial and not technical, and that the rules of procedure made under the Judicature Acts have not conferred a jurisdiction which did not exist before. If this conclusion be well founded, I do not think that the allegation contained in the statement of claim, "that the defendant company did and committed the Acts above mentioned and complained of with intent to injure and destroy the trade of the plaintiff company, and to deprive it of its aforesaid lands, territories, mines, minerals, and mining rights and property"

disclosed a cause of action cognisable by our courts any more than the paragraph complaining of trespass. The statement of defence alleged that the lands in question were in the possession of a certain native chief named Umtasa, who exercised sovereignty over the same, and that by a concession or treaty granted by Umtasa and his indunas or council to the defendants, they acquired the right to possession and occupation of the lands, and that the plaintiffs were wrongfully attempting to take possession of the lands, and that the defendants did the acts complained of in order to prevent the plaintiffs from so wrongfully taking possession of them. This defence was demurred to by the second paragraph of the reply. The Queen's Bench Division overruled the demurrer; but the Court of Appeal varied this judgment by ordering the demurrer to stand over until the trial of the action, to be dealt with by the judge at the trial. The Master of the Rolls thought the decision of the Divisional Court on this point correct. And I do not understand that either of the learned judges, who concurred in varying the order, doubted that, if proved, the paragraph in dispute disclosed a valid defence in point of law. Thompson v. Barclay (16) and other cases of the same description, in which it is said the courts have refused to recognise the sovereign rights of provinces which had revolted from a State at amity with Great Britain when their independence was not shown to have been recognised by the proper authorities in this country, appear to me to have no application to the circumstances of the present case.

- A I do not see any sufficient ground for disturbing the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division on this point. Whether the plea can be proved, and whether the determination of any question raised by it will be for the judge and not the jury are questions which do not arise at the present time. For the reasons with which I have troubled your Lordships at some length, I think the judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the judgment of the Divisional Court restored, and
- B that the respondents should pay the costs here and in the court below. I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD HALSBURY.—Although I am unable to concur with the conclusion at which LOPES, L.J., arrived, I think he stated very clearly the only real question which is in debate. That learned judge said that, in his opinion, the courts of

C this country have, and always had, the inherent jurisdiction contended for—namely, the jurisdiction to try an action for trespass to land situated in a foreign country, and that the only objection to doing so arose from the technical rule of local venue. That is the question very plainly stated, and, if that be the correct view of the law, the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, having altered the technical rule, the action might be tried in England.

- D I am, however, unable to come to the conclusion that that is correct. It is true that the phrase "local venue" is technical, and would not, I think, have been intended by the learned persons responsible for the legislation of 1873 to have been understood to refer to any question of jurisdiction at all. Rules of procedure and practice in England would not, I think, in the contemplation of anyone, touch questions of territorial or international jurisdiction. The word "venue" has come
- E to be used as if it were literally equivalent to the word "place," but that was not the original meaning, although the idea of place is included within it. It is not accurate to speak of "venue" as though it referred to place in an unlimited sense. No two questions can be more distinct than the question whether a matter is in the jurisdiction of the English courts at all, and whether a matter undoubtedly within the jurisdiction of the courts shall be assigned for trial to particular courts
- F in England.

There is a concurrence of opinion of most jurists, if not all, as to the distinction between what we call realty and personalty, by whatever words those things are distinguished in the jurisprudence of foreign countries, which affects very materially the right to try. VATTTEL distinguishes the questions which may properly be tried

- G "where defendant has his settled place of abode, but always subject to this: that if the matter relates to an estate in land, or to a right annexed to such an estate, in such a case, inasmuch as property of the kind is to be held according to the laws of the country where it is situated, and, as the right of granting it is vested in the ruler of the country, controversies relating to real property can only be decided in the State in which it depends."

- H I am quoting STORY's version (STORY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, s. 553) of VATTTEL's language. That very learned lawyer proceeds to point out that the distinction between local and transitory actions is one which is known to the common law. I somewhat doubt whether STORY, J., intended by his language to enter into the controversy as to whether the principle expressed in the maxim "debitum et contractus sunt nullius loci" is coeval with what we know as the common law.
- I LORD COKE undoubtedly does say so in Bulwer's Case (17), but, as SERJEANT STEPHEN points out it is difficult to reconcile that view with the known history of our jurisprudence in respect of the original functions of the jury, to whom was at one time committed the proof as well as the determination of a cause; and it is not consistent with the observations of GILBERT, C.B. (GILBERT'S HISTORY OF CIVIL ACTIONS, p. 84). I think that which STORY, J., intended to refer to was the actual system of our common law at the time he wrote; and undoubtedly the current of authority at that time was all in one direction.

Although the original state of our law may not be very important in respect of the controversy now before your Lordships, there is one view of it that seems to me to throw a considerable light upon the questions now in controversy. The invention of fictions and the limit within which they were permitted is discussed at length in PRYNNE'S ANIMADVERSIONS ON, AMENDMENTS OF, ADDITIONAL RECORDS TO, THE FOURTH PART OF THE INSTITUTES, a mine of learning upon the subject of legal antiquities which the diligence of the learned counsel who argued this question at your Lordships' Bar has turned to skilful account. PRYNNE boldly states that no such fiction was permitted before the date of Henry VIII, but the reasons given for the permitting of the fiction and the limitation within which it was permitted seem to me to have important bearing, and to be much more important than its date. It was a principle of pleading well understood and rigorously enforced, that a traverse must not be taken on an immaterial point. Where, therefore, the actual place of, for instance, a debt or contract, was alleged (though contrary to the fact) to be some place in England, the defendant was not at liberty to deny that the place alleged was in England, since in such matters the place was immaterial, and, according to the rigorous principles of pleading to which I have referred, any immaterial traverse was not permitted. But wherever the place was material, as the unvarying current of authorities establishes that it was in all controversies relating to land, the defendant might traverse the place, and, even if he did not, if it appeared in proof that the place was out of England, the plaintiff was non-suited.

I do not think that one authority has been cited to your Lordships to the contrary, with the single exception of LORD MANSFIELD's references to what took place before himself at nisi prius. I confess that the authority of LORD MANSFIELD appears to me to prove too much. He appears to have surmounted the difficulty of local venue in a manner which is wholly irreconcilable with the argument so much pressed upon your Lordships that the absence of precedent in the present action is accounted for throughout all English legal history by the objection that the rule of local venue formed a bar to an action being brought. But it appears to have been omitted to be considered that LORD MANSFIELD decided in the plaintiff's favour, and, so far as I can judge from the phrase used by his Lordship "which in England would be local actions," he must have decided upon the ground that, inasmuch as the action before himself was for trespass to realty abroad, the action would not be limited by the rule of local actions in England. Whether the argument be good or bad, it certainly is not one which sustains the contention that it was the law of local venue which prevented such actions being tried in England.

I further doubt very much whether the observations attributed to LORD MANSFIELD can be quite accurately recorded. His Lordship undoubtedly seems to have misunderstood Shelling v. Farmer (18), since he attributes to EYRE, C.J.'s decision the very reverse of what that learned judge decided. The plaintiff in that case sued for trespass to his person and to his house in the East Indies; and EYRE, C.J., rejected evidence as to the house, but permitted evidence as to himself, though LORD MANSFIELD quotes him as overruling the objection. This was in 1739. In 1774 Mostyn v. Fabrigas (3) was decided, and in 1792, in Doulson v. Matthews (4), LORD KENYON, C.J., and BULLER, J., where the question directly arose, decided otherwise. In that case, which is supposed to have settled the law, they held that, as a matter of settled practice, actions of trespass to land were local. In the opinions of the judges delivered to your Lordships' House by WILLES, J., it is stated, without any qualification, that an action of trespass to land abroad did not lie: London Corpn. v. Cox (5). It is difficult to construe LORD MANSFIELD's own language consistently with the view which he is supposed to have entertained; but, whatever account may be given of his Lordship's utterances, which, in respect of the matter before him in Mostyn v. Fabrigas (3) were undoubtedly obiter, I must say that I could not yield to his authority when it is opposed to the views of so many judges from 1667 downwards.

A There is one observation made by FRY, L.J., in the Court of Appeal, which appears to me to be subject to very much the same criticism which I have suggested in respect of LORD MANSFIELD's utterance, namely, that it proves too much. After describing the limitations upon the jurisdiction of the King's Courts, the lord justice says that

B "gradually their jurisdiction was extended, especially by the legislation and the quo warranto proceedings of Edward I, until in the lapse of time, it burst the barriers within which it was originally confined, and came to be, not inaptly, described as 'a universal jurisdiction and superintendency.'"

The lord justice was too severe a logician not to have measured the extent of the language which he thus quotes; but I am satisfied that he would himself have admitted that in thus speaking of the jurisdiction of the English courts, the words "universal" and "superintendency" must receive some limitation, and the only limitation that, to my mind, they are properly susceptible of would be by the addition of the words "over all courts and causes in England." If they were to be understood according to the exact and precise meaning of the language employed without some such limitation, they would, to my mind, be so obviously

D inaccurate as not to require to be further dealt with.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of WRIGHT, J., and of the Master of the Rolls was correct, and I think, therefore, that the judgment on this point should be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I concur in the motion which has been proposed, and

E in the reasons upon which it is founded.

LORD MORRIS.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, and I may say that I entirely concur in it, and could not hope usefully to add anything.

Contract—Illegality—Purchase of shares—"Rigging the market"—Agreement to buy shares at fictitious premium—Action to recover purchase money—Competency.

C

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants, stockbrokers, for rescission of a contract to purchase shares in a company, and to recover the purchase-money paid by him for them to the defendants, on the ground that the defendants, while acting as the plaintiff's brokers, had delivered their own shares to him instead of purchasing them on the Stock Exchange. At the trial it appeared from the evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff that he had paid the money in pursuance of an agreement between him and one of the defendants, by which the latter was to purchase the shares on the Stock Exchange at a premium in order to induce the public to suppose that the shares were at a real premium which in fact, as the plaintiff and the defendants well knew, they were not.

Held: the action was founded on an illegal contract and could not be maintained.

Applications for new trial. Consolidated actions were tried before WRIGHT, J., and a special jury at the Guildhall on May 6 and 7, 1892.

E The plaintiffs, Scott, who was interested in floating the Steam Loop Co., and Slaughter, the solicitor of the company, brought actions against Brown, Doering, McNab & Co., brokers to the company, to recover money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants on contracts for the purchase of shares in the company. One Gillespie was one of the principal promoters of the company.

F The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of LOPES, L.J. : The defendants in both actions were members of the London Stock Exchange, and in December, 1890, they were brokers to the Steam Loop Co., Ltd., which had issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions for its share capital, and the defendants had previously to such issue, underwritten a part of the share capital of the company and were holders of a considerable number of shares of the company. The plaintiffs in the second action were the solicitors to the company. The plaintiffs in both actions had instructed the defendants to purchase shares for them respectively in the company, and had duly paid for such shares. The plaintiffs in both actions sought to recover the price paid for such shares from the defendants, on the ground, among others, that, instead of purchasing shares for them in the ordinary way, the defendants had transferred to the plaintiffs the defendants' own shares.

G The plaintiffs in both actions relied upon a contract contained in certain letters and telegrams passing between the plaintiffs and the defendants between Dec. 6 and 9, 1890. On Dec. 6, 1890, the following telegrams passed: McNab to Scott :

"Should advise you to get 5,000 done by Trust Co. Steam Loop."

McNab to Scott :

I "Must have positive order from you to buy at least 500 Loop shares in market on Monday, to start market on. Gillespie and Jack doing this on understanding that you do so. This necessary to ensure public application and to start market. Reply."

McNab to Scott :

"Unless have telegram agreeing to my former wire as to market in shares I must withdraw from this business."

McNab to Scott :

"You must agree, otherwise I drop the whole thing, as without it advertisements wasted and no public application; also no market in shares. Waiting reply."

Scott to Slaughter:

"McNab wires me I must give him positive order buy 500 Loop shares in market on Monday start market. Gillespie and Jack doing same condition I do. Wired no. McNab replies must, otherwise he will drop the whole business. I reply by writing him to-night. Wire what you advise."

Slaughter to Scott:

"Have agreed with McNab that the 500 Gillespie owed us may be applied market purposes. Think additional support needed. Written you fully to-night."

Scott to Slaughter:

"Am quite agreeable to what you have arranged with McNab."

On the same day McNab wrote to Scott:

"As I wired you to-day, it is an absolute necessity that somebody sends orders to buy Steam Loop in the market, otherwise who is going to start the market? Slaughter and myself are going 500 shares, Gillespie 500, Burnham 100, Jack 200, and honestly you ought to go at least 500. There is no risk in the matter. We have absolutely £47,000 underwritten, and whatever the public come in for will help the market. Then, again, unless we can get a quotation into the papers, saying the shares are at a premium, on Monday, we will never get the public on. This we can manage with practically no risk to ourselves if we combine and absolutely buy the shares. If we do not do it, the money spent on advertisements is simply thrown away. . . . If I am to go on at all I must know that some one is going to back me up in at least starting the market in the shares. If it is not done I must give up the whole business, as otherwise I will be nothing more than a fool in this business. It is a vital point, and, whatever you write me to-night, please understand that it has to be done, and I must have orders on Monday from some one in Manchester to start the market on. . . . Do give this matter your assent, and wire me early on Monday that you are good for a purchase of at least 500 shares in the market. You must excuse my having written and wired so strongly about this, but it is an absolute necessity that it has to be done. You have only to ask any one about new companies if it is not a necessity. Awaiting your reply on Monday morning."

On Dec. 7, 1890, Scott wrote in reply to Slaughter:

"As I wired you last night, I am quite agreeable that the £500 you, McNab, and I lent Gillespie shall be used to make a market, on condition that Gillespie gives you a written promise to pay the £500 in cash as soon as he has received his cash from the company. I am agreeable to this £500 also being spent in making a market, if you are."

On Dec. 8, 1890, Slaughter wrote to McNab:

"Steam Loop.—On behalf of Mr. D. Scott, I hereby authorise you to buy at a premium ordinary shares up to £500."

On the same day, Gillespie wrote to Slaughter:

"You have authorised Mr. McNab on Mr. Scott's behalf to buy at a premium ordinary shares up to £500, I write this line to confirm to you that it has been agreed between us that the £500 in cash or the £600 in shares which I have promised to Mr. Scott shall be £500 in cash, and shall be paid out of the second instalment I receive."

On Dec. 9, 1890, Brown, Doering & Co. wrote to Slaughter as follows:

"We beg to enclose contract for purchase of 429 Steam Loop shares at 6s. 7d. premium. This is your proportion of the shares bought up to-night, taking

A an average of the orders from D. Scott, Gillespie, Burnham, and Jack. We have also averaged the price of the shares. We have forwarded to the "Financial News" the contract note for shares bought to-day on your behalf—150 shares, at 8s. 4½d. premium—to get the quotation."

B WRIGHT, J., held that there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiffs' case, and directed the jury that there must be a verdict for the defendants, and after drawing attention to the letters which passed between the parties, said :

C "I am not going in this case either to express any opinion myself, or to ask you to express an opinion as to what these particular parties did; but as the question has arisen, I do say that if persons, for their own purposes of speculation, create an artificial price in the market by transactions which are not real, but are made at a nominal premium merely for the purpose of inducing the public to take shares, they are guilty of as gross a fraud as has ever been committed, and of a fraud which can be brought home to them in a criminal court."

D The plaintiff applied for a new trial.

Reid, Q.C., and Boydell Houghton for the plaintiffs.

Willis, Q.C., and C. Rose Innes for the defendants Brown and Doering.

Murphy, Q.C., and P. Rose Innes for the defendant McNab.

E The court raised the objection that the evidence appeared to disclose an illegal conspiracy, in which the plaintiffs had taken part, and were, therefore, disentitled to relief.

Aug. 1, 1892. The following judgments were read.

F LINDLEY, L.J. My brother A. L. SMITH has written a judgment in this case, which I have read, and in which I concur. As, however, the case is one of great importance, I will add a few observations on it myself.

G Ex turpi causa non oritur actio. This old and well-known legal maxim is founded in good sense and expresses a clear and well-recognised legal principle, which is not confined to indictable offences. No court ought to enforce an illegal contract or allow itself to be made the instrument of enforcing obligations alleged to arise out of a contract or transaction which is illegal, if the illegality is duly brought to the notice of the court, and if the person invoking the aid of the court is himself implicated in the illegality. It matters not whether the defendant has pleaded the illegality or whether he has not. If the evidence adduced by the plaintiff proves the illegality the court ought not to assist him. If authority is wanted for this proposition it will be found in the well-known judgment of LORD

E MANSFIELD in Holman v. Johnson (1).

I In this case the correspondence put in evidence by the plaintiff in support of the claim he made at the trial shows conclusively that the sole object of the plaintiff in ordering shares to be bought for him at a premium was to impose upon and deceive the public by leading the public to suppose that there were buyers of such shares at a premium on the Stock Exchange, when in fact there were none but himself. The plaintiff's purchase was an actual purchase, not a sham purchase; that is true, but it is also true that the sole object of the purchase was to cheat and mislead the public. Under these circumstances the plaintiff must look elsewhere than to a court of justice for such assistance as he may require against the persons he employed to assist him in his fraud, if the claim to such assistance is based on his illegal contract. Any rights which he may have irrespective of his illegal contract will, of course, be recognised and enforced. But his illegal contract confers no rights on him: see Pearce v. Brooks (2). The illegal purpose of the plaintiff distinguishes this case from Wetherell v. Jones (3) and others of a similar kind. I am quite aware that what the plaintiff has done is very commonly done; A it is done every day. But this is immaterial. Picking pockets and various forms of cheating are common enough, and are nevertheless illegal. The plaintiff was not entitled to judgment in the court below, and he has no right to a new trial.

LOPES, L.J., stated the facts set out above, said that it was unnecessary to B determine the holding of WRIGHT, J., that there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiff's case and that there was a preliminary matter to be considered of which the judge might and the court could and should take judicial notice, and continued: I have read these letters and telegrams to show what the C nature of the transaction was. In my judgment, it was an agreement between the plaintiffs and defendants to induce would-be buyers of shares in this company, contrary to the fact, to believe that there was a market for its shares, and that the shares were of greater value than they really were. Putting it shortly—an agreement to cheat the public by leading them to believe the shares had a value, which the plaintiffs and defendants knew they had not, and thus inducing them to become purchasers. Is such a transaction illegal? I am of opinion that it is, and might be made the subject of an indictment for conspiracy.

R. v. De Berenger (4) is an authority on this subject. It was an indictment for D conspiracy by false rumours to raise the price of the public government funds with intent to injure those who should purchase, and LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., said (3 M. & S. at pp. 72, 73):

"A public mischief is stated as the object of this conspiracy; the conspiracy is E by false rumours to raise the price of the public funds and securities; and the crime lies in the act of conspiracy and combination to effect that purpose, and would have been complete, although it had not been pursued to its consequences, or the parties had not been able to carry it into effect. The purpose itself is mischievous, it strikes at the price of a vendible commodity in the market, and if it gives it a fictitious price by means of false rumours, it is a fraud levelled against all the public, for it is against all such as may possibly F have anything to do with the funds on that particular day."

I can see no substantial distinction between false rumours and false and fictitious acts; the price of the shares in this case was artificial, and the premium unreal and nominal, to the knowledge of all parties concerned, put forward to induce the public to take shares, with which otherwise they would have had nothing to do.

Again, in R. v. Aspinall (5) it was held that an agreement to cheat and defraud G by means of false pretences those who might buy shares was an indictable offence.
BRETT, L.J., said (2 Q.B.D. at p. 59):

"If the second count in this indictment contains averments sufficiently stated which are enough to show sufficiently that the defendants unlawfully, i.e., with minds intending to do wrong, agreed by false pretences to cheat and defraud those who might buy shares in the company, it sufficiently alleges a criminal H conspiracy."

I entertain no doubt that the agreement on which the plaintiffs rely is an illegal agreement. If the agreement is illegal, the question arises, whether the plaintiffs are not disentitled to recover, and whether they have not forfeited the relief which a court of law in other circumstances would have afforded them. Begbie v. Phos- I phate Sewage Co. (6) is conclusive on this point. It was an action for money had and received, plea never indebted, and it was held that the plaintiff could not recover because he was aware that no exclusive right to use the process in question could be obtained, and had entered into the contract with the defendants in contemplation of a fraud upon the shareholders of the intended company. COCK-BURN, C.J., said (L.R. 10 Q.B. at pp. 499, 500):

"Another ground of defence insisted on is that, the money having been paid for the purpose of defrauding the intended shareholders, by holding out to them

A the assurance of an exclusive right to use the process in question, as an inducement to contribute their money, when it was known to the parties engaged in getting up the new company, that no exclusive right existed or could be obtained, the plaintiff cannot maintain an action to recover back the money, on the well-established principle that money paid in furtherance of a fraud or other unlawful purpose cannot be recovered back. . . . Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the money sought to be recovered in this action having been paid in order to obtain from the defendants the agreement whereby this fraud could be carried out, the rule of law insisted on by the defendants applies, and is a bar to the plaintiff's right to recover.

B The case falls immediately within the principle of the decisions in Simpson v. Bloss (7), Jones v. Yates (8), and Fivaz v. Nicholls (9). The plaintiff cannot present his case to a jury without necessarily disclosing the unlawful purpose in furtherance of which this money was paid."

C Every word of that judgment applies. It is to be observed that the illegality of the contract was not pleaded. The point was taken by the court and acted upon. The plaintiffs cannot and do not in this case more than in that, present their case to the jury without necessarily disclosing the unlawful purpose in furtherance of which the contract was entered into. The plaintiffs, therefore, in my opinion, are disentitled to relief, and on this ground the appeal must be dismissed.

D A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiff Scott applies to this court to set aside a non-suit which passed against him at the Guildhall. He asserts that there was evidence to go to the jury of his cause of action, which was for the rescission of a contract to purchase shares in a company about to be brought out and to be called the Steam Loop Co., and for the return of £632 3s. 5d. paid thereunder to the defendants, upon the ground, among others, that the defendants, while acting as his brokers, had passed off their own shares to him instead of purchasing them upon the market. It appeared upon the plaintiff's own case that the plaintiff and the defendant McNab were jointly interested with others in bringing out this company and in floating its shares upon the market, and that the £632 3s. 5d. sought to be recovered in this action was paid by the plaintiff to the defendant in pursuance of an agreement come to between the plaintiff and the defendant McNab, that McNab should therewith purchase 500 shares of the projected company when brought out, at a premium (at the time of the agreement there was neither company nor market), the sole object of such purchase being that the public might thereby be induced to believe that the shares of the company were at a real premium, whereas in truth and in fact, as the plaintiff and the defendant McNab well knew, they were not. Neither the plaintiff nor the defendants would raise the point of the illegality of the transaction at the trial, and WRIGHT, J., who tried the case, made some strong comments upon their conduct, but did nothing further in the matter.

H If two or more persons agree to cheat and defraud others by means of deceit and fraud, there can be no doubt that each and all are indictable for a criminal conspiracy at common law. It has been held that it is a criminal conspiracy for two or more to agree by false rumours to endeavour to raise the price of the public funds on a particular day: see R. v. De Berenger (4). It has also been held in R. v. Aspinall (5) that an agreement by two or more to cheat and defraud by means of false pretences those who might buy shares in a company was an indictable conspiracy. False pretences here do not mean such false pretences as would support an indictment for obtaining money or goods by false pretences: see R. v. Hudson (10). LOPES, L.J., has gone fully into the correspondence, but the telegram and letter of Dec. 6, 1890, from the defendant McNab to the plaintiff; the letter of Dec. 7, 1890, from the plaintiff to Slaughter, and of Dec. 8, 1890, from Slaughter to McNab, in my judgment are sufficient. These documents contain, in my judgment, conclusive proof that the plaintiff and McNab, agreed together to cheat and defraud those who might buy shares in the company, by leading them to believe that the shares were at a genuine premium, whereas to their knowledge they were not, the fictitious premium being sought to be brought about by means of the purchase to be made with the plaintiff's £632 3s. 5d. by McNab, and which were to be made for the sole purpose of creating such fictitious premium. These documents were read by the plaintiff's counsel when he opened his case as showing the purposes for which the plaintiff and the defendant McNab had agreed that the purchases should be made. The agreement between two or more to do an illegal act has been proved.

The next question is: Was it shown that the plaintiff and McNab agreed to carry out this intention by illegal means—viz., by deceit and fraud? For if so, there can be no possible doubt that an indictable conspiracy has been committed, viz., the agreement to do an illegal act by illegal means. It is not necessary in this case to discuss whether the whole of this must be proved to constitute an indictable conspiracy. It is said for the plaintiff that there was nothing deceitful or fraudulent in his paying his £632 3s. 5d. to McNab to purchase shares with upon the open market, and if that had been all I agree; but the question is, was the payment made as it was for the sole purpose of creating therewith a fictitious premium, in order to induce the public to purchase shares in the company, and thereby benefit the plaintiff and McNab at the expense of the buyer—a deceitful and fraudulent means whereby to cheat and defraud those who might buy shares in the company? I am of opinion that it was. Test it in this way. Suppose a purchaser was induced to purchase shares of the plaintiff or McNab by means of the fictitious premium created by them solely for the purpose of inducing such purchaser and others to buy, could he or not have successfully sued either or both for a false and fraudulent misrepresentation? I say that he could, and this is another way of stating the same proposition, viz., that the plaintiff and McNab agreed by means of deceit and fraud to cheat and defraud the would-be purchasers of shares. The agreement to do an illegal act by illegal means is proved. For the reasons above both the plaintiff and McNab were liable to be indicted for conspiring to cheat and defraud.

How does the law stand upon the subject? If a plaintiff cannot maintain his cause of action without showing, as part of such cause of action, that he has been guilty of illegality, then the courts will not assist him in his cause of action. This was decided in Taylor v. Chester (11), where the illegality was pleaded, and also in Begbie v. Phosphate Sewage Co. (6), where it was not pleaded, but, the fraud being apparent, the court would not interfere. When the plaintiff's statement of claim is looked at it will be seen that he there states the purposes for which he handed the money to the defendants—viz., to "keep up the price of the shares," which upon the evidence was shown to be "to create a fictitious premium." In my judgment, the plaintiff, when suing the defendants for breach of contract, as he does, has to prove the whole contract, and it was not competent for him to put in evidence only half of the contract, and he did not do so, for the letters above read were opened by the learned counsel as part of his case. Immediately the whole contract upon which the plaintiff sues is put in, the illegality of the conduct of the plaintiff and of McNab at once becomes apparent. In my opinion, the maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis applies, and this court ought not to assist the plaintiff when he seeks to recover the £632 3s. 5d. back from the defendants. Upon these grounds, and without going further into the case, this appeal must be dismissed, and with costs.

Arbitration—Arbitrator—Unfitness—Preclusion from keeping mind open.

The plaintiff contracted to construct a dock for the defendant company, the contract providing that any dispute between the company and the contractor as to the meaning of any part of the contract, or as to the quality or description of the materials to be used in the works, should be referred to the company's engineer as arbitrator. A dispute arose whether under the contract the interior of a certain embankment was to be made of stone, or whether it might be filled up with rocky marl, so that, if the contractor by the direction of the engineer used stone, he would be entitled to be paid for it as an extra. Correspondence took place between the contractor and the engineer, in which the engineer stated that, in his opinion, the contract bound the contractor to use stone, and that it was not an extra. The company then referred the dispute to the arbitration of the engineer. After the reference and on the day for which the first appointment was made, the engineer wrote to the contractor, repeating his former opinion. The plaintiff brought an action to restrain the company from proceeding further with the arbitration.

Held: (i) considering that the arbitrator, as engineer of the company, must necessarily have already expressed an opinion on the disputed point, the fact that after the commencement of the arbitration he wrote a letter in which he repeated the same opinion did not disqualify him from acting as arbitrator unless the true inference to be drawn from the letter was that he had precluded himself by it from keeping his mind open, and from deciding according to the evidence and the advice of his legal assessor; (ii) (A. L. SMITH, L.J., dissentiente), the letter did not show that the arbitrator had precluded himself from keeping his mind open and the injunction must be discharged.

Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J.

On Nov. 27, 1891, the Barry Rail. Co. accepted a tender by the plaintiff, Jackson, B to construct a dock for them at the price of £152,938 7s. 6d., according to a specification which contained the following clause :

"50. In the event of any question or dispute arising between the company and the contractor as to the intent and meaning of any part of this specification or of the drawings referred to therein, or of any further drawings to be prepared, or as to the intent and meaning of any part of the tender or schedule of C quantities and prices, or the application of the same to the account of the contractor, or as to the manner of executing the works, or the quality or description of the materials, implements, or plant used or required to be used in the works, or as to the mode of measuring the works or the computation of or payments for the same, or as to the interpretation, meaning, or effect of the clauses and conditions of the contract, or of any of them, or as to any other matter or D thing whatever connected with or arising out of the contract or incidental thereto, or not thereby provided for, such questions or disputes shall be referred to the engineer, whose decision shall be conclusive and binding on both parties."

Another clause provided that in the specification the word "engineer" should E mean one J. W. Barry, or other the engineer for the time being appointed by the company.

While the works were in progress, a question arose as to the construction of an embankment or breakwater. It was not disputed that it was to be faced with stone, but the contractor and the engineer could not agree as to the filling up.
The engineer assented to a portion of the filling up being done with rocky marl, F
but required the rest to be rubble stone, which was more expensive than filling up with rocky marl. It was not disputed that the engineer could direct this to be done, but the question arose whether the contractor was entitled to be paid for the stone as an extra. Correspondence took place on the subject between the plaintiff and Barry and on July 20 Barry wrote :

"Although the whole of the hearting of the old breakwater consists of hard G rock filling, I am willing to agree as a concession to you, that a portion of the hearting of the closing bank may be formed of rocky marl, the remainder of the closing bank being made with hard rock obtained by the excavation of the lock, which is to be selected and put into the closing bank, instead of being carried to spoil or used in any other way."

On July 22 the plaintiff wrote : H

"I can only say that we are saving the good stone we are now getting from the lock excavations for use in the internal masonry as provided in the note on
p. 39 of the specification, and I must decline to deposit it as you wish at the breakwater, unless it is agreed that I shall be paid for it."

On July 25 Barry wrote : I

"I have received your letter of July 22, 1892, in which you refuse to deposit any of the stone obtained from the excavations of the lock as required by me in the closing bank to the western breakwater unless it is agreed that you shall be paid for it. I beg to say that I am willing to hear any arguments which you may have to adduce in support of your construction of the specification, but I distinctly decline to come to any agreement on the subject until the arguments are heard on both sides and the matter is decided. In the mean-

A time I call upon you to proceed with the work in accordance with my instructions."

On July 26 Barry wrote a letter stating :

B "The bank to the breakwater is not a tip for spoil as you seem to describe it, but is a contract work specially shown upon the contract drawing, and referred to in the specification, and was always intended to be made of hard rock from the excavation through the whole of its cross-section, until, as a concession to you, I agreed that the central part might be made of rocky marl according to a cross-section which had been sent to you, showing what I would accept."

C As the plaintiff still maintained that he was not bound to fill up with stone unless he was paid for it as an extra, on July 28 the company's solicitors gave notice to the plaintiff that they should forthwith apply to the engineer to fix an early day for hearing the parties and determining the dispute. They applied on the same day, and the engineer made an appointment for Aug. 2, when a meeting took place, at which the engineer appointed a lawyer to be his assessor. On Aug. 1, the plaintiff D commenced this action to have the construction of the specification as regards this question determined, and for an injunction to restrain the company from proceeding with the arbitration.

On July 28 the plaintiff wrote to Barry giving various reasons in support of his own construction of the specification, and containing the following statement :

E "Moreover, after the tender was accepted, it was I who first suggested to you the unadvisability of using marl for the heaving of the breakwater without a stone bank to protect it."

On Aug. 2 Barry replied as follows :

F "I have your letter of July 28. In view of the fact that this matter has now reached the stage of arbitration, I must decline to enter into any of the arguments advanced in that letter, and will content myself by saying, in order to avoid any misconstruction which might hereinafter arise from my allowing the statement to pass unnoticed, that I cannot in any way agree with your statement, that it was you who first suggested 'the unadvisability of using marl for the heaving of the breakwater without a stone bank to protect it.' On the contrary, as I have already stated in my previous letters, there was G never any intention to construct this breakwater in any way differently from the others, namely exclusively of stone, filling with protecting stones on the outside, and smaller protecting stones on the inside, until in December last I agreed to accept a small portion of rocky marl as a concession to you."

H On Aug. 10, 1892, KEKEWICH, J., granted the plaintiff an injunction restraining the defendants from further proceeding to arbitration, saying that, as the parties had chosen to refer all matters in dispute to Barry, the court could not take into consideration that he might have a strong natural bias to construe the contract in the manner most creditable to himself as being responsible for its contents, but that the clause making him arbitrator was never intended to enable him to act as such with reference to a question on which he had already come to a conclusion, and that his letters, especially that of Aug. 2, showed he did not bring an open I mind to the case, but had made up his mind upon it.

Nov. 24, 1892. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order made by KEKEWICH, J., granting an injunction to restrain the defendants, the Barry Rail. Co. and their agents, until the trial from further proceeding with a reference to arbitration before Mr. John Wolfe Barry on the question which had arisen under the agreements in the writ of summons mentioned. A

It appears by those agreements, to which I shall not have to refer at any great length, that Mr. Jackson, the plaintiff, undertook certain works for the Barry Rail. Co. The engineer was Mr. John Wolfe Barry. The agreement for the construction of the works is a very long one, and contains a great number of clauses which have become very common in contracts of this kind, and in particular there is cl. 50 which I will read. [His LORDSHIP read cl. 50.] That is part of the bargain, and it means, to put it more shortly, that if any dispute arises between the contractor and the company, or in substance—the engineer being the person to look after the contractor in the interest of the company—if any dispute arises between the contractor and the engineer, it is to be decided by the engineer. A question did arise as to whether, under the terms of the contract, the contractor was bound to use stone for a certain portion of the works which he had contracted to do, and whether, if he was bound to use it, the price of it was covered by the contract price, or was to be treated and paid for as an extra. The contractor did not deny that he was bound to put in stone if ordered by the engineer, and the engineer did order it; but the question then was, whether the contractor was bound to put in stone for the contract price, or whether, if he put in stone in obedience to the order of the engineer, that would be an extra. The engineer told the contractor his view of it, and I do not see how, considering his position, he could help expressing his view. His view was, that the contractor was bound to put in this stone, and was not at liberty to charge for it as an extra. The contractor's view was, that if he put it in he was at liberty to charge for it as an extra. That being the nature of the question which had arisen, the company proceeded to make arrangements to have it settled by arbitration, and on July 28 Barry appointed "twelve o'clock noon on Tuesday next, Aug. 2, for proceeding with the arbitration." Before that date arrived Jackson wrote a long letter to Barry enforcing his views and containing a statement which Barry did not admit to be accurate, and on Aug. 2, 1892, which it will be observed was the day already fixed for the arbitration, Barry wrote and sent to Jackson the letter which I am about to read. [His LORDSHIP read Barry's letter of Aug. 2.] B

It is contended by Jackson, and the judge has acceded to that contention, that the true inference to be drawn from this letter is, that Barry, who was then about to enter upon his duties as arbitrator, had not left his mind open, but had, before hearing the case, and before being advised by his legal assessor, so tied himself down by this letter as not to leave it reasonably open to him to depart from the view which he had previously taken and previously expressed. Unquestionably, if I drew the same inference from this letter, I should agree in the consequence; but I am unable to draw that inference. It appears to me that, when you look at this letter carefully, it is perfectly consistent with this letter that Barry merely repeats what he had said scores of times before, that his opinion was that the contract entitled the company to have stone without paying extra for it. I do not understand this letter as expressing, or as implying or insinuating, "I have made up my mind, and whatever my assessor may advise me I shall stick to my opinion." I think it would be a strained interpretation to come to that conclusion. Unless that is so, unless we can draw the inference that the engineer has precluded himself by this letter from keeping his mind open, and from deciding according to the evidence and according to the advice which might be given him, we ought not, in my opinion, to stop this arbitration, and I say that the more readily because, under s. 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, there is a method by which the contractor can, if he feels aggrieved, obtain the opinion of the court upon the true construction of the contract. Under that section the engineer can, and if directed by the court he must, state a Case for the opinion of the court upon any question of law G

A arising in the course of the reference, and I cannot infer from this letter that Barry was in the least reluctant to exercise that power, even without the direction of the court.

Upon these grounds I am unable to concur in the view taken by the judge, and I think the injunction ought to be discharged. I have assumed for the moment that there is jurisdiction to grant the injunction. That point was hardly pressed
B and hardly argued, and I pass it by, simply observing that, if the point ever should come up for decision again, it must be rather more carefully considered than it has been in this case. I do not deny the jurisdiction—far from it; but, on the other hand, I wish to guard myself from passing that over as if it were a matter of course. I decide the question upon the merits. I cannot agree with the judge, and I think the appeal must be allowed, and the order discharged with costs.

C BOWEN, L.J.—It was an essential feature in the contract between the plaintiff and the railway company that a dispute such as that which has arisen between the plaintiff and the company's engineer should be finally decided, not by a stranger or a wholly unbiased person, but by the company's engineer himself. Technically the controversy is one between the plaintiff and the railway company, but
D virtually the engineer on such an occasion must be the judge, so to speak, in his own quarrel. Employers find it necessary in their own interests, it seems, to impose such terms on the contractors whose tenders they accept, and the contractors are willing, in order that their tenders should be accepted, to be bound by such terms. It is no part of our duty to approach such curiously coloured contracts with a desire to upset them or to emancipate the contractor from the
E burden of a stipulation which, however onerous, it was worth his while to agree to bear. To do so would be to attempt to dictate to the commercial world the conditions under which it should carry on its business. To an adjudication in such a peculiar reference the engineer cannot be expected, nor was it intended, that he should come with a mind free from the human weakness of a preconceived opinion. The perfectly open judgment, the absence of all previously formed or pronounced
F views, which in an ordinary arbitrator are natural and to be looked for, neither party to the contract proposed to exact from the arbitrator of their choice. They knew well that he possibly or probably must be committed to a prior view of his own, and that he might not be impartial in the ordinary sense of the word. What they relied on was his professional honour, his position, his intelligence; and the contractor certainly had a right to demand that whatever views the engineer might
G have formed he would be ready to listen to argument, and at the last moment to determine as fairly as he could after all had been said and heard.

The question in the present appeal is whether the engineer of the company has done anything to unfit himself to act or render himself incapable of acting not as an arbitrator without previously formed or even strong views, but as an honest
H judge of this very special and exceptional kind. I will assume (without deciding) what was assumed by both sides in the argument at the Bar, that the point before us is properly raised in such an action as the present, and consider the matter entirely on the merits. That the letter of Aug. 2 shows Barry to have had and retained up to the opening of the arbitration a rooted view that the contractor was wrong is obvious. This Barry may not have been able to avoid. Has he, then, disqualified himself from pursuing the function of such an arbitrator as the contract
I contemplates by informing the contractor, in answer to the contractor's controversial letter, of what the contractor I am convinced well knew already—viz., that Barry wholly disagreed with him? I cannot see that the letter of Aug. 2 warrants the inference that Barry would not or could no longer do his best, when the matter formally came before him and his legal assessor, to decide honestly between his own distinct view and that of the contractor. He re-states, it is true, what he had already stated, and I daresay he thought it fair and honest towards the contractor to do so. I should agree with the judgment of KEKEWICH, J., if I thought the letter of Aug. 2 amounted to an intimation that the contractor would not be out this agreement was passed and confirmed. All the creditors of the company had either been paid or had assented to the arrangement.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, BOWEN and A. L. SMITH, L.J.J.), affirming a decision of NORTH, J.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the opinion of LORD HERSCHELL, L.C. In the courts below it was held that the case was governed by Re Denver Hotel Co. (1).

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Kirby for the appellant company.

Romer for the respondent, a dissentient shareholder.

A Their Lordships took time for consideration.

April 16, 1894. The following opinions were read.

B LORD HERSCHELL, L.C. The appellant company on May 18, 1892, presented a petition praying that a special resolution passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the corporation might be confirmed by the court. The resolution provided for a modification of the conditions of the memorandum of association by a reduction of the capital of the company from £2,000,000, divided into 188,600 ordinary shares of £10 each, and 114,000 general founders' shares of £1 each (of which there had been issued 63,109 ordinary and 72,298 general founders' shares), to £1,691,737, divided into 160,767 ordinary shares of £10 each and 84,067 general founders' shares of £1 each, and that the remainder of the capital—namely, the 27,833 ordinary shares, numbered as therein mentioned—be paid off (the capital represented thereby being in excess of the wants of the company), and that such last-mentioned ordinary and general founders' shares respectively and all liability thereon be wholly extinguished. The company had carried on business in the United States, and a portion of its investments were in that country. These investments had been made by the directors on the advice of a committee of the board resident in America.

D Differences arose between the board of directors in England and the American committee as to the management of the business of the corporation, which rendered it impossible to carry on such business both in England and the United States with advantage. It was accordingly determined that the best course to be adopted was that the company should cease to carry on business in the United States, and it was arranged that the American investments should be made over to the American shareholders subject to the payment of £11,000 to the corporation, and that the shares held by the American shareholders should be cancelled, thus reducing pro tanto the capital of the company. This arrangement was, as I have stated, approved by the shareholders at two extraordinary general meetings. All the creditors of the company have either been paid or have assented to the arrangement.

E The interests of the shareholders alone have, therefore, to be considered. On the hearing of the petition confirmation by the court was opposed by one of their number. NORTH, J., dismissed the petition with costs, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The case was, in both courts, supposed to be governed by the views expressed by the Court of Appeal in Re Denver Hotel Co. (1) that a company could not reduce its capital by paying off some of its shareholders unless all shareholders of the same class were dealt with alike. The merits of the arrangement embodied in the resolution now in question were not entered into. The position assumed was that the court had no power to confirm it as being ultra vires.

G This renders it necessary to consider carefully what are the powers conferred by the Companies Act, 1867, and the amending Act of 1877. By the earlier of these statutes companies were for the first time empowered to reduce their capital. Section 9 provides that any company limited by shares may, by special resolution, so far modify the conditions contained in its memorandum as to reduce its capital; and by s. 11 a company which has passed a special resolution for reducing its capital may apply to the court by petition for an order confirming the reduction, and on the hearing of the petition the court, if satisfied that every creditor entitled to object to the reduction has either been paid or been secured or consents, may make an order confirming the reduction. In consequence of views indicated by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Ebbw Vale Steel, Iron, and Coal Co. (3), that the Act of 1867 did not sanction the return of unpaid capital the Act of 1877 was passed. It was enacted by s. 3 that "capital," as used in the Act of 1867, shall include paid-up capital, and the power to reduce capital conferred by that Act "shall include a power to pay off any capital which may be in excess of the wants of the company." To the terms of s. 4 I shall have occasion to refer presently.

It will be observed that neither of these statutes prescribes the manner in which the reduction of capital is to be effected. Nor is there any limitation of the power of the court to confirm the reduction, except that it must first be satisfied that all the creditors entitled to object to the reduction have either consented or been paid or secured. A

It can scarcely be denied that such a scheme as that under consideration, by which certain of the shareholders receive a part of the assets of the company equivalent to their shares therein, such shares being then cancelled, is a mode of effecting a reduction in the capital of the company. When Trevor v. Whitworth (2) was before this House LORD MACNAGHTEN said (12 App. Cas. at pp. 437, 438): B

“I may say that the Act of 1867, as explained by the Act of 1877, seems to prohibit a company from purchasing its own shares, except under certain stringent conditions. When Parliament sanctions the doing of a thing under certain conditions and with certain restrictions, it must be taken that the thing is prohibited unless their prescribed conditions and restrictions are observed. Now the Act of 1882 makes no provision for reduction of capital. The Act of 1867 allows a limited company to reduce its capital under conditions which carefully protect the interests of creditors. The Act of 1877 explains that the power to reduce capital includes a power to ‘pay off any capital which may be in excess of the wants of the company,’ and it dispenses with some of the prescribed conditions when the reduction does not involve either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital, or ‘the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital.’ It follows that, if the operation be affected by payment of capital to any one shareholder, all the prescribed conditions must be followed. Payment of capital to any one shareholder is just as much a reduction of capital, and just as detrimental to the interests of creditors, as the payment of the same amount among all the shareholders rateably. It is none the less a payment off of capital, within the meaning of the Act of 1867, as explained by the Act of 1877, because the shareholder to whom the payment is made renounces in return the right to participate in the joint stock of the company.” C

I did not express myself so definitely on the point, but I said (ibid. at pp. 415, 416):

“Experience appears to have shown that circumstances might occur in which a reduction of the capital would be expedient. Accordingly, by the Act of 1867, provision was made enabling a company, under strictly defined conditions, to reduce its capital. Nothing can be stronger than these carefully worded provisions to show how inconsistent with the very constitution of a joint-stock company, with limited liability, the right to reduce its capital was considered to be.” G

Further on I said (ibid. at p. 416):

“And the stringent precautions to prevent the reduction of the capital of a limited company without due notice and judicial sanction, would be idle if the company might purchase its own shares wholesale, and so effect the desired result.” H

There can be no doubt that the ratio decidendi in that case was in part, at least, this—that a company which paid away its assets for the purchase of its own shares did thereby reduce its capital, and that not in a manner authorised by the legislature. I

If, then, the scheme which the court is asked to confirm be in fact one for reduction of capital, I am, with all deference, at a loss to understand how the court in confirming it could be acting ultra vires, seeing that, as I have pointed out, the statute has not prescribed the manner in which the reduction is to be carried out, nor has it prohibited any method of effecting that object. Indeed, s. 4 of the Act of 1877 recognises that a scheme may involve the payment to a shareholder of a

A part of the paid-up capital, for it enacts that where the reduction of capital by the company does not involve either the diminution of liability in respect of unpaid capital or the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital, the creditors of the company, unless otherwise directed by the court, shall not be entitled to object or required to consent to the reduction. In Re Denver Hotel Co. (1), LINDLEY, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, said ([1893] 1 Ch. at pp. 505, 506):

B "If this transaction really was a purchase by the company of its own shares from one shareholder only, we are of opinion that the court could not sanction it. The purchase by the company involves the possession by the company of sufficient assets to pay for the shares bought, and the capital represented by such shares would not be lost, nor unrepresented by available assets. The capital might be in excess of the wants of the company, within the words of s. 3 of the Companies' Act, 1877. But these words cannot, in our opinion, be construed so as to enable a company to prefer one shareholder to another of the same class as himself by buying up his shares, and we cannot regard LORD MACNAGHTEN's judgment in Trevor v. Whitworth (2) as intimating that any such transaction is within the statute. His remarks were made to enforce his view that, apart from the Companies Acts, 1867 and 1877, it is ultra vires of a limited company to buy its own shares, even if its memorandum and articles expressly authorise it to do so. But he was not contemplating preferring one shareholder to another of the same class as himself."

If all the shareholders of a company were of opinion that its capital should be reduced, and that this reduction would best be effected by paying off one shareholder

E and cancelling the shares held by him, I cannot see anything in the Acts of 1867 and 1877, which would render it incumbent on the court to refuse to confirm such a resolution, or which shows that it would be ultra vires to do so. I do not see any danger in the conclusion that the court has power to confirm such a scheme as that now in question, or any reason to doubt that this was the intention of the legislature. The interests of creditors are not involved, and I think it was

F the policy of the legislature to entrust the prescribed majority of the shareholders with the decision whether there should be a reduction of capital, and if so, how it should be carried into effect. The interests of the dissenting minority of the shareholders (if there be such) are properly protected by this: that the decision of the majority can only prevail if it be confirmed by the court. This is a complete answer to the argument ably urged by counsel for the respondent that if all the

G shareholders of the same class were not dealt with in precisely the same fashion, the interests of the minority might be unjustly sacrificed to those of the majority. There can be no doubt that any scheme which does not provide for uniform treatment of shareholders whose rights are similar, would be most narrowly scrutinised by the court, and that no such scheme ought to be confirmed unless the court be satisfied that it will not work unjustly or inequitably. But this is

H quite a different thing from saying that the court has no power to sanction it.

It was further argued that the scheme was not within the statutory powers of the company, inasmuch as these were confined to paying off "any capital which may be in excess of the wants of the company." I may observe that s. 3 of the Act of 1877, which contains these words, only enacts that the power to reduce capital conferred by the Act of 1867, "shall include" that power. But even if this is

I to be regarded (which I am far from saying that it is) as a limitation of the power to reduce capital by paying off paid-up capital, I am of opinion that, in view of the alterations intended in the method of carrying on the business of this corporation the case is one in which the reduction has been effected because the capital is in excess of the requirements of the company. Assuming that it is within the power of the court to confirm such a scheme as the present, it was scarcely contended by the respondent that there was any ground for refusing to do so, or that it involved any result either unjust or inequitable; and, indeed, in

It will be observed that neither of these statutes prescribes the manner in which the reduction of capital is to be effected. I may observe that s. 3 of the Act of 1877, which contains these words, only enacts that the power to reduce capital conferred by the Act of 1867, "shall include" that power. But even if this is

Assuming that it is within the power of the court to confirm such a scheme as the present, it was scarcely contended by the respondent that there was any ground for refusing to do so, or that it involved any result either unjust or inequitable; and, indeed, in view of the evidence before the court, it would not have been possible successfully to maintain such a contention. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment appealed from should be reversed, and that the special resolution should be confirmed, and I move your Lordships accordingly. Having regard to the fact that the term "reduced" has been used in describing the company for a very considerable time, I think that they may be allowed hereafter to discontinue that addition.

LORD WATSON.—The appellants, who are a company limited by shares, ask the court to confirm a special resolution for the reduction of their capital, which has been passed by a statutory majority of the members. The scheme submitted for confirmation involves the cancellation of all their unissued shares, and also the application of part of the available assets of the company to the purchase and extinction of a certain proportion both of general founders' shares and ordinary shares, those being the two classes into which their nominal capital is divided. If the scheme were carried out their reduced capital would consist of the shares now held by those members whose interests are not to be purchased and extinguished. The company have practically no outside creditors; but their petition is opposed by the respondent, who owns shares of both classes. At the Bar of the House he did not maintain that, under the scheme sought to be confirmed, the shareholders of either class, whether they were bought out or continued to be members, would not each of them receive a fair and reasonable equivalent for his present interest in the company, and nothing more. He relied solely upon the plea that it is beyond the statutory jurisdiction of the courts to sanction any scheme for the reduction of capital which does not deal in precisely the same way with each and every share belonging to the same class.

If that be the law it is manifest that in some cases the result might be unfortunate. Apart from the interest of creditors, the question whether each member shall have his share proportionately reduced, or whether some members shall retain the shares unreduced, the shares of others being extinguished upon their receiving a just equivalent, is a purely domestic matter, and it may be greatly for the advantage of the company that the latter alternative should be adopted. Although every member of the company were agreed as to the desirability of taking that course, if the plea of the respondent be well-founded, the court would have no power to assist them. NORTH, J., dismissed the petition, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. There is no record before us of what was said by the judges; but it appears that the case was admitted by counsel to be within the rule expressed by LINDLEY, L.J., in Re Denver Hotel Co. (1), and that the rule was followed as a precedent binding upon them, and without discussion by the Court of Appeal.

In that case the scheme before the court for its approval embraced a transaction for the sale of one of the company's assets to a shareholder. The sale was to be in consideration of a sum of £3,000, and, as LINDLEY, L.J., states, "in further consideration of his surrendering his shares to the company." NORTH, J., who had refused confirmation, held that the transaction amounted in substance to the repayment of capital to part of a class of shareholders, against the wish of one-seventh of the whole; and, in those circumstances, he was of opinion that he had no power to give effect to the arrangement, although he considered it to be a beneficial one, and would have been prepared to sanction it if he had the power to do so. The Court of Appeal reversed his judgment, and confirmed the resolution. They held that the transaction was not a purchase, but a surrender of shares, which could have been effected by the company without the sanction of the court. LINDLEY, L.J., said ([1893] 1 Ch. at pp. 505, 506):

"If this transaction really was a purchase by the company of its own shares from one shareholder only, we are of opinion that the court could not sanction it. The purchase by the company involves the possession by the company of

A sufficient assets to pay for the shares bought, and the capital represented by such shares would not be lost nor unrepresented by available assets. The capital might be in excess of the wants of the company, within the words of s. 3 of the Companies Act, 1877. But these words cannot, in our opinion, be construed so as to enable a company to prefer one shareholder to another of the same class as himself, by buying up his shares, and we cannot regard LORD MACNAGHTEN's judgment in Trevor v. Whitworth (2) as intimating that any such transaction is within the statute."

I agree with the lords justices in thinking that the observations made in Trevor v. Whitworth (2) by LORD MACNAGHTEN were not intended to have, and have not, any direct bearing upon the construction of the powers committed to the court, with respect to reduction of capital, by the Act of 1867 and subsequent statutes. They were directed to the point that the purchase of its own shares by a company, although made on terms advantageous, is, in effect, a reduction of its paid-up capital, and is, therefore, ultra vires of the company. For the purpose of this appeal Trevor v. Whitworth (2) does not appear to me to go further than to affirm that the purchase of its shares by a company is one of the methods by which a reduction of its capital can be effected. It does not establish that reduction by that method is more deeply tainted with illegality than any other means by which the same result is attainable.

To my mind, the only substantial question arising in this appeal is whether these empowering statutes give jurisdiction to entertain proposals for reduction of capital in any manner whatever of which the courts may approve, or whether their jurisdiction is excluded, in the case of proposals to reduce it by the purchase of shares. Section 9 of the Act of 1867 contains the leading enactments upon this subject. It enables a company limited by shares so far to modify the conditions in its memorandum of association as to reduce its capital, if authorised to do so by its regulations as originally framed, or as altered by special resolution. Section 11 provides that a company which has passed a special resolution to that effect may apply to the court for its confirmation. Specific directions are given for the guidance of the court, with the view of protecting the interests of creditors of the petitioning company; but, in so far as concerns the interests of its members, I do not find a single expression in the Act tending to indicate that the discretion of the court to grant or refuse such an application does not extend to every possible mode of reducing capital.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Denver Hotel Co. (1) proceeds upon the view that reduction by purchase of shares is not covered by the words of s. 3 of the Act of 1877. Assuming that view to be correct, the section does not, in my opinion, derogate from the rights already given to companies, subject to the approval of the court, by the Act of 1867. It does not profess to give a complete definition of these rights; it simply explains, and possibly extends, in some particulars, the provisions of the previous statute. Section 4 contains a proviso which appears to me to support the inference that capital may be legitimately reduced by buying out some of the members of the company. It dispenses with certain conditions required by the Act of 1867, except in cases where the reduction of capital involves "either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital, or the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital." These last words appear to contemplate that repayment of paid-up capital may be made either to all or to one or more of the body of shareholders.

For these considerations I cannot, notwithstanding the able argument of counsel for the respondent, resist the conviction that the courts below were bound to entertain the present case and to dispose of it upon its merits. I see no reason to doubt that the Court of Appeal arrived at a just conclusion in Re Denver Hotel Co. (1), although I am by no means satisfied that the surrender made in that case was one which the company could lawfully accept without the sanction of the court. In Trevor v. Whitworth (2), LORD MACNAGHTEN said (12 App. Cas. at p. 438):

"I conceive that there can be no objection to the surrender of shares which are liable to forfeiture. A surrender of shares in return for money paid by the company is a sale, and open to the same objections as a sale, whatever expression may be used to describe or disguise the transaction."

I concur in that opinion; and I do not think the transaction ceases to be a sale in substance when the surrender of his share forms, not the whole, but part only, of the consideration given by a shareholder in exchange for an asset of the company. Seeing that the respondent has not argued that any injustice would follow to himself or any other member of the company, I am of opinion that your Lordships ought not only to reverse the judgments appealed from, but to confirm the special resolution.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I agree. Under the Companies Act, 1862, it was not competent for a company limited by shares to reduce its capital. Such an operation would have been in contravention of one or more of the statutory conditions of the memorandum, which the Act as it then stood made unalterable. The difficulty, however, was removed shortly afterwards by legislation. The Companies Act, 1867, declares that any company limited by shares may, by special resolution, so far modify the conditions contained in its memorandum, if authorised to do so by its regulations as originally framed, or as altered by special resolution, as to reduce its capital. The power is general. The exercise of the power is fenced round by safeguards which are calculated to protect the interests of creditors, the interests of shareholders, and the interests of the public. Creditors are protected by express provisions. Their consent must be procured, or their claims must be satisfied. The public, the shareholders, and every class of shareholders, individually and collectively, are protected by the necessary publicity of the proceedings, and by the discretion which is entrusted to the court. Until confirmed by the court the proposed reduction is not to take effect, though all the creditors have been satisfied. When it is confirmed the memorandum is to be altered in the prescribed manner, and the company, as it were, makes a new departure. With these safeguards, which are certainly not inconsiderable, the Act apparently leaves the company to determine the extent, the mode, and the incidence of the reduction, and the application or disposition of any capital moneys which the proposed reductions may set free.

The Companies Act, 1877, was passed mainly in order to remove certain doubts created by the decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Fbbw Vale Steel, Iron, and Coal Co. (3), which was a surprise to the profession at the time, and is, I believe, generally thought to have been incorrect. At any rate, the Act of 1877 gives no support or countenance to the construction which SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., adopted; in fact, it destroys the foundation of his argument. While it dispenses with the intervention of the court in the case of reduction of capital by cancellation of shares not taken or agreed to be taken by any person, it yet reserves to the court the power of requiring the consent of creditors in the case of reduction by cancellation of lost capital, the very case in which SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., thought such a requirement so unreasonable that he felt constrained to hold that the case itself was not within the Act. The Companies Act, 1877, declares that certain cases to which, in the opinion of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., the Act of 1867 did not apply, shall be included in the power conferred by that Act. It introduces some valuable amendments, and it is useful in throwing light upon the scope of the earlier Act. It is clear, for instance, from s. 4, that the court must look at the arrangements as a whole, and have regard to all the circumstances of the case, and the consequences which, to use the language of the Act, the reduction "involves." Then it is clear from the following part of the section that, in the opinion of the legislature, reduction of capital is a matter which concerns, or

A may concern, the public. The court must take everything into account before confirming the reduction. But there is not a word in the Act of 1877 from beginning to end tending to narrow the scope of the Act of 1867. The generality of the powers conferred by that Act is left wholly untouched.

B Turning to the facts of the case under appeal, your Lordships have before you an English company limited by shares and formed for the purpose of engaging in financial undertakings of every sort and description in every part of the globe. Its main purpose, however, was to make investments in English and American securities, and the operations so far have been confined to that field. The English business is under the control of the board of directors in London. The American business has been managed by some of the directors who are resident in America, acting as a committee under the supervision of the London board. For some time C past there has been friction between the London board and the American committee. The board were cautious and old-fashioned. The committee advocated a bolder policy, and demanded a freer hand. Matters were approaching a dead-lock. At last, after much negotiation, both sides arrived at the conclusion that a separation of interests was desirable. It was seen that, in the state of the market, winding-up would be disastrous to all concerned. So it was proposed that the D American shareholders who were content to follow the American committee should take over the American assets and sever their connection with the company, and that the English shareholders should take the English assets, receiving an agreed sum by way of adjustment.

The proposed arrangement has been approved by special resolutions at general meetings, in which the American shareholders, apparently, took no part. The E application to the court was for an order confirming a reduction of capital to meet the arrangement. It is for the company, and for the company alone, to judge of the prudence of the course proposed. The objects of the company are wide enough to swallow up the wealth of Lombard Street, or of the city of London. But again it is for the company to determine, subject of course to the statutory provisions for the protection of creditors, whether its capital, under the circum- F stances, and in view of the policy approved by the shareholders, is or is not in excess of its present wants. It is not suggested by the one shareholder, who stands alone in opposing the application, that the majority are acting oppressively, or that the arrangement is unfair or inequitable in the ordinary sense of those words. His real objection rather seems to be that he prefers the American system of doing business, and that he has more confidence in the American committee than G in the London board.

Why should the proposed arrangement not be carried into effect? The House has not the advantage of any judgment on the question, either in the court of first instance or in the Court of Appeal. It seems to have been conceded in both courts that the case was governed by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Re Denver Hotel Co. (1), the actual decision in which does not touch the question, H although there are some observations of LINDLEY, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, which, if accepted, would conclude the matter. Speaking for myself, I cannot see any substantial distinction between Re Denver Hotel Co. (1), where the reduction was confirmed, and the present case, where it is admitted that, if the view of the Court of Appeal in Re Denver Hotel Co. (1) be correct, confirmation must be refused. In both cases, as it seems to me, you have a purchase by a I limited company of its own shares; for I cannot agree that a transaction which involves a surrender of shares as part of the consideration is anything but a purchase of shares within the meaning of the opinion of this House in Trevor v. Whitworth (2).

Undoubtedly, as LINDLEY, L.J., observes, "the cases upon reduction of capital are not in a satisfactory state." There are authorities in which it seems to be laid down that a proposed reduction of capital cannot be confirmed if it involves a purchase by the company of its own shares for that reason alone. That of itself, however, cannot be a sufficient objection. The shares are not to be purchased out of the company's registered capital, but out of moneys withdrawn from the capital and set free by the reduction. A company cannot employ any part of the capital with which it is registered, so long as it forms part of its registered capital, in the purchase of its own shares. But, if it proposes to reduce its capital in accordance with the statutory provisions which empower it to do so, there is no reason why it should not employ the fund set free by the reduction in the purchase of shares which it is intended to extinguish. Nothing can be more contrary to the principle of the Companies Acts than the return of capital by a company limited by shares. But, if capital money is set free by reduction of capital, no one ever suggested that it could not be returned to the shareholders; and, indeed, the Act of 1877 declares that such an operation is included in the power conferred by the Act of 1867. The fact that a thing is prohibited if it is done in the wrong way, and at a time when the circumstances of the case do not justify it, is no reason for holding the thing prohibited if it is to be done in the right way, and when it is justified by the circumstances.

Counsel for the respondent did not press this point as constituting in itself a sufficient answer to the application. The reduction, he said, was not objectionable simply because it involved a purchase by the company of its own shares, but because a purchase by a company limited by shares of some of its own shares must involve dealing with shareholders, members of one and the same class, in different ways. You cannot, he said, reduce or extinguish some of a class of shares without equally reducing or extinguishing all the others of the same class. That was the objection which, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, would have been fatal to the application of the Denver Hotel Co. if the court had regarded the transactions as really a purchase of shares. The words of s. 3 of the Act of 1877 "cannot in our opinion," says LINDLEY, L.J., "be construed so as to enable a company to prefer one shareholder to another of the same class as himself by buying up his shares." With all deference I venture to think that that mode of stating the proposition is really begging the question. It assumes that the person whose shares are to be purchased is getting a preference, an undue advantage for himself, at the expense of his fellow shareholders. But why should that assumption be made? The person whose shares are bought gets money or money's worth. The persons on whose behalf the company buys have their own shares improved by the value of the shares extinguished. If the parties to the transaction come to the conclusion that the bargain is a fair one, why should the court say that there is a preference on the one side or on the other? If there is nothing unfair or inequitable in the transaction, I cannot see that there is any objection to allowing a company limited by shares to extinguish some of its shares without dealing in the same manner with all other shares of the same class. There may be no inequality in the treatment of a class of shareholders, although they are not all paid in the same coin, or in coin of the same denomination.

It is not easy to ascertain the origin of the objection urged on behalf of the respondent, though it has been put forward not infrequently. It seems to have grown out of the decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. (4) on which counsel for the respondent relied, where the company's memorandum of association declared that the capital was divided into a certain number of shares. There was nothing in the memorandum or in the articles to indicate that the shares might be of different classes. The directors found that they could not issue the whole as ordinary shares. A special resolution was passed authorising the directors to issue a certain number of preference shares. The proposed issue was restrained at the suit of an ordinary shareholder, on the ground mainly that, although the company had passed a special resolution authorising the issue of preference shares, they had not in terms altered one of the original articles which provided for equality among shareholders in respect of dividends. The company then passed a special resolution altering the obnoxious article. They were again met by an application for an injunction, and the injunction was granted by KINDERSLEY, V.-C., on the ground that there was an implied stipulation in the

- A memorandum of association that all the shareholders should stand on an equal footing in respect of dividends, and that what it was proposed to do was "contrary to the very nature of a joint stock company," and was "an alteration in the constitution of the company." It is difficult to understand what the Vice-Chancellor meant by the expression "constitution of the company," and it is difficult to deal with an argument resting on a phrase so vague. Nor is it easy to understand the Vice-Chancellor's view that equality among shareholders in respect of dividends was an "implied stipulation in the memorandum." There is nothing in the Act of 1862, or in any other Act requiring the memorandum to contain anything in reference to the rights of shareholders inter se. The division of the capital into shares of a certain fixed amount, which must appear in the memorandum, would not be altered or affected by issuing some of these shares as preference shares.

- C The practical result of the decision has been that, except in cases coming within the rule laid down in Harrison v. Mexican Rail. Co. (5), a decision which has not met with universal acceptance, no company limited by shares that has not taken power by its memorandum to issue preference shares has been able to raise additional capital in the manner most advantageous to its shareholders and its creditors.
- D It seems to me that the decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (4) was not founded upon a sound view of the Companies Act, 1862, and I respectfully dissent from it. I have the less hesitation in expressing this view, because I find that CORTON, L.J., has disapproved of the chief ground on which the decision was based. In Guinness v. Land Corpn. of Ireland (6) he says (22 Ch.D. at p. 377):

- E "In reality it is not by implication from the construction of the memorandum that the equality of the shareholders as regards dividends arises, but by the implication which the law raises as between partners, unless their contract has provided the contrary."

- LINDLEY, L.J., in a later case, took the same view (Re South Durham Brewery Co. (7)). I agree that the equality of shareholders as regards dividends is not an implied condition of the memorandum. But I doubt whether it is necessary to have recourse to the doctrines of partnership. It seems to me that, if the sum of the interests of persons concerned in a joint adventure is divided into shares of equal amount, distinguished by numbers for the purpose of identification, but with no other distinction between them express or implied, it follows as a self-evident proposition that the interests of the shareholders in respect of their shares as regards dividend and everything else must be equal.

- G In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that the objection on the part of the respondent is not well founded. I think that the proposed reduction is within the power conferred by the Act of 1867. As NORTH, J., has observed in Re Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co. (8) (39 Ch.D. at p. 594):

- H "There is nothing in the Act which requires that the reduction should be spread either equally or rateably over all the shares of the company."

There is nothing in my opinion either unfair or inequitable in the arrangement involved in the proposed reduction, and I see no reason why it should not be confirmed.

LORD MORRIS concurred.

- I Appeal allowed. Special resolution confirmed.

Landlord and Tenant—Small tenement—Possession—Termination of term by notice—Refusal by tenant to yield up possession—Ejectment order directing possession within twenty-one days—Right of landlord to begin to demolish house within twenty-one days.

The plaintiff, a quarterly tenant of the defendant, was served with notice to quit expiring on June 24, and on June 25 he received notice to vacate the premises at once as they were going to be pulled down. The plaintiff remained in occupation, and on Sept. 3 the defendant obtained an order for ejectment under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, requiring the plaintiff to give up possession within twenty-one days. Before the twenty-one days had expired the defendant's builder, under a contract with the defendant, began to take off the roof of the premises and in so doing damaged the plaintiff's furniture. The plaintiff, who left the premises at the end of twenty-one days, claimed damages for trespass from the defendant.

Held: since the ejectment order did not extend the plaintiff's right to remain in possession or affect the defendant's right at common law to take possession on the expiration of the notice to quit, the removal of the roof did not amount to forcible entry, the plaintiff had no cause of action against the defendant, and his claim failed.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of SIR RUPERT KETTLE, sitting at Malvern County Court, in an action by the plaintiff, the tenant, against the defendant, his landlord, for trespass and damage to the plaintiff's furniture.

The plaintiff, Jones, was a quarterly tenant to the defendant, Lady Emily Foley, of a cottage at a rent of £7 a year. On Mar. 24, 1890, the defendant's agents gave the plaintiff notice to quit the premises on June 24. On the expiration of the notice the plaintiff refused to give up the premises though he had been repeatedly asked to do so. The defendant, who wanted possession of the cottage in order to pull it down and build a new one on the site, served the plaintiff with a notice under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, of her intention to apply to justices for a warrant of possession. On Sept. 3 the application was made to and granted by the justices and an order made requiring possession to be given up within twenty-one days from that date. On the same day the defendant's workmen acting under his instructions commenced to pull down a cottage adjoining the plaintiff's and in so doing took some tiles from the plaintiff's roof over a bedroom thus exposing the room to the sky and some damage was done to the plaintiff's

A furniture by falling tiles and mortar. The men, however, desisted on being spoken to by the plaintiff. On Sept. 4 the defendant commenced digging the foundations of new cottages in the plaintiff's garden, and in so doing pulled up some fruit trees and cabbages. On Sept. 21 the plaintiff vacated the cottage but early in the morning of the same day the defendant and his workmen pulled off some tiles from the roof of the plaintiff's cottage. On Oct. 30 the plaintiff brought an action

B in the county court against the defendant for £50 "as damages for trespass on and between Sept. 3 and 24, 1890, at a cottage and garden in the occupation of the plaintiff, and damage to the plaintiff's furniture, pictures, garden produce and other effects." The county court judge directed the jury that the issue of the justices' warrant entitled the plaintiff to retain possession during the currency of the twenty-one days, but that even if they, the jury, found that the plaintiff

C was not entitled to possession, if they found that possession of the premises was obtained by force, i.e., the act of removing the roof, that act of force was indictable as a forcible entry and that for injury to the plaintiff's furniture resulting therefrom the defendant would be liable in damages. The jury found for the plaintiff damages for £40. From that decision the defendant appealed.

D R. H. Amphlett for the defendant.
A. T. Lawrence for the plaintiff.

DAY, J.—This appeal must succeed. The plaintiff had no right to remain in possession after the defendant's notice to quit had expired. The landlord was quite entitled to take possession. The landlord was quite entitled to take the roof off or to take the house down, and if in consequence the plaintiff's goods were damaged, that was the plaintiff's own fault for allowing his goods to remain on the premises after the tenancy had expired. If a landlord made a forcible entry he might be indicted, but taking off the roof did not amount to a forcible entry. It was unfortunate the plaintiff's goods were damaged, but the goods ought not to have been in the house. The magistrates' order did not extend the tenant's right to remain

F in possession, but merely fixed a time when the landlord might have the assistance of an officer to take possession. The tenant had no right to be in the house; he was a trespasser, and the injury to his furniture was the result of his obstinacy in remaining on the premises. The magistrates' order in no way affected the common law rights of the defendant. What was done in this case did not amount to a forcible entry, and the plaintiff has established no cause of action. The defendant's appeal must be allowed, and judgment must be entered for the defendant.

G

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that the removal of the roof was a forcible entry within the meaning of the statute. The defendant had a right at common law to possession, provided no forcible entry was made.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Herschell, L.C., Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.),

Estoppel—Estoppel by record—Judgment by consent—Winding-up—Company—Judgment by consent against company for instalment of debt—Liquidator estopped from disputing compromise sued on.

A judgment by consent creates an estoppel between the parties just as much as does a judgment resulting from a decision of the court on a contested action.

The defendant company agreed to pay the plaintiffs a debt by instalments. The company defaulted on the second instalment, and the plaintiffs brought an action against it for the amount of the instalment. By its defence the company denied the existence of the agreement and counterclaimed for the return of the first instalment. A compromise was reached under which judgment by consent for the amount of the second instalment was entered for the plaintiffs, the company's counterclaim was dismissed, and it was agreed that, if the company failed to perform certain conditions, the plaintiffs should be at liberty to issue execution for the full amount of the debt and to enforce payment of the further instalments due under the agreement. The company failed to perform the conditions. Subsequently, they went into liquidation. The plaintiffs claimed to prove in the winding-up for the balance of their debt, but the official receiver and liquidator rejected the proof.

Held: the judgment by consent estopped the official receiver from denying the existence of the agreement by the company to pay the debt; and, accordingly, the plaintiffs' proof must be admitted.

Notes. Referred to: Cooke v. Rickman, [1911-13] All E.R.Rep. 152; Re Jon Beauforte (London), Ltd., Applications of Grainger Smith & Co. (Builders), Ltd., John Wright & Son (Veneers), Ltd. and Lowell, Baldwin, Ltd., [1953] 1 All E.R. 634.

Appeal from a decision of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division, on a summons taken out by the plaintiffs, the Bank of England, against the official receiver and liquidator of the South American & Mexican Co., Ltd., asking that proof of a debt might be admitted in whole in the winding-up of the company.

Under an agreement the defendants became liable to the plaintiffs for a debt of another company. The debt was repayable by instalments, and the first instalment was duly paid by the defendants. The defendants failed to pay the second instalment of £100,000, and the plaintiffs thereupon brought an action against them for the amount of the instalment. By their defence the defendants denied the agreement to pay the debt and counterclaimed for return of the first instalment. At the trial of the action, before KENNEDY, J., a compromise was reached under which judgment by consent was entered for the plaintiffs on the claim for the instalment of £100,000, with costs; the defendants' counterclaim was dismissed, with costs; and it was further ordered by consent that execution should be stayed but that if the defendants failed, within the time limited by the judgment, to pay a stated sum to the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs should be at liberty to issue execution for the full amount of the judgment debt, and to enforce payment of

A the further instalments claimed by them under the plaintiffs' agreement with the defendants. The defendants failed to pay within the time limited by the judgment. Subsequently, they went into liquidation. In the winding-up the plaintiffs claimed to prove for the balance of their debt. The official receiver and liquidator rejected the proof.

B VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., admitting the plaintiffs' proof, held that the judgment by consent estopped the official receiver and liquidator from disputing that there existed an agreement binding on the company to pay the debt. The defendants appealed from that decision.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and G. P. C. Lawrence for the defendant company.

C Finlay, Q.C., H. D. Greene, Q.C., Reginald Bray and Howard Wright, for the plaintiffs, were not called on to argue.

D LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—I think that the judgment of the learned judge in the court below in this case was right. An action had been brought by the Bank of England against the defendant company claiming a sum of £100,000 as the second instalment of a larger claim—as a sum agreed to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs. That was the action—an action for a second instalment due on an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants. There was a counter-claim to recover back the sum paid as the first instalment, alleging that the agreement was only inchoate, or that it was conditional, and that the condition had not been performed. The case was partly tried, and thereupon, by consent of the parties, an order was made that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs on the claim for £100,000 and costs, and the counterclaim was dismissed with costs.

E It seems to me that a judgment for the plaintiffs on the claim is a judgment for them, not for a sum of £100,000 at large—it is a judgment for them on a claim for £100,000, being part of a debt due, namely, the second instalment. Then it was further ordered that execution should be stayed, and that if within three weeks £60,000 should be paid—£20,000 in cash and £40,000 by a promissory note—and if the promissory note was duly paid, that £60,000 should be taken in satisfaction of all claims; that is to say, all claims by the plaintiffs under the agreement. Then it was further ordered that, if the promissory note was not paid—and that was the event that happened—the plaintiffs should be at liberty to issue execution for the full amount of the judgment debt, and to enforce the payment of the further instalments claimed by them under the plaintiffs' agreement with the defendants. F Although it is said that those words "under the agreement with the defendants" do not appear in the minute signed by counsel, at all events the words appear that they should be at liberty to enforce further instalments. What is the meaning of that? It is said that, notwithstanding that agreement to give judgment for the claim, it was open to the defendants to make default in paying the £60,000 and then to say, "As regards all but this one instalment for which you have got judgment, the matter is at large; you have got judgment as for an instalment of a debt in respect of which you sue, but we are to be at liberty now to say that there never was a debt at all; we cannot affect this £100,000, but we may dispute any liability to anything further." G

H I do not think that that is the meaning fairly to be gathered from the settlement arrived at or the order of the judge. I do not think that the fair meaning was that they were to be at liberty afterwards to dispute the existence of any debt at all. It is to be observed that what the plaintiffs are to be at liberty to enforce is further instalments. What is the meaning of that? Instalments of that debt, the existence of which is recognised and which is the basis of the judgment—that debt in respect of which judgment is then given for the instalment then due. The defendants say, "If we do not carry out our present arrangement with you, you are to be at liberty to enforce payment of these further instalments." They do not merely say, as it seems to me, "You are to be at liberty then to take proceedings for payment of those further instalments or claims, and we are to be at liberty to insist that there never was any debt, and there never ought to have been any judgment, and that therefore there are no instalments due." I do not think that that is the fair construction or the fair effect of an arrangement of this sort, where a judgment is given by consent. A

The truth is, a judgment by consent is intended to put a stop to litigation between the parties, just as much as a judgment is which results from the decision of the court after the matter has been fought out to the end. Very often the object of it is to stop litigation; and I think it would be very mischievous if one were not to give a fair and reasonable interpretation to such judgments, and to allow questions that were really involved in the action—questions which if decided against the party against whom judgment is given would show that there ought to be no judgment at all—to be fought over again after judgment has been agreed to in a subsequent action. I think, therefore, that the judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs. B C

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think that this case is arguable in a lawyer's sense of the expression. It is impossible to read that compromise without seeing that the necessary result of it is, and I believe the intention of the parties to it was, that the dispute between them should be brought to an end. I do not say that was all, because there was the money; but to say after that that it is competent to any person to re-open the litigation and dispute the validity of the claim is to say that which I think no lawyer could possibly for a moment assent to. D

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree.

Execution—Garnishee order—All debts owing from garnishee—Order granted to answer judgment debt—Balance of bank account greater than debt—Attachment of whole account. H

The appellant had some £6,800 standing to his credit on deposit and current accounts with the respondent who was his banker. The respondent was served with a garnishee order by a judgment creditor of the appellant whose debt amounted to £6,000, the garnishee order attaching "all debts owing or accruing due" from the garnishee to the judgment debtor in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1. Subsequently, cheques drawn by the appellant on the balance of £800 over and above the amount of the judgment debt were dishonoured by the respondent. I

Held: the respondent was justified in refusing to honour the cheques, for the garnishee order, by its terms, attached all debts which the garnishee could be called on to pay although they were more than the amount sufficient to satisfy the particular judgment debt.

- E Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.), reported 23 Q.B.D. 236, affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (MATHEW and GRANTHAM, JJ.), refusing a new trial in an action, tried by POLLOCK, B., brought by the appellant against the respondent, who had acted as his banker, to recover damages for the alleged detention of certain bonds, and also for the dishonour of his cheques. The case is reported upon the latter point only.

- F As regarded the claim in respect of the dishonoured cheques, it appeared that the appellant had been involved in litigation, and that on Feb. 15, 1881, a garnishee order nisi was served on the respondent attaching the moneys standing to the credit of the appellant with the respondent to satisfy a judgment for £6,000. At this time there was standing to the credit of the appellant with the respondent, both on deposit and current account, a sum of £6,870. On Feb. 17 the appellant gave seven days' notice of withdrawal of the amount on the deposit account. The cheques were drawn subsequently to this and were dishonoured, the respondent refusing to honour them on the ground that the whole banking account had been attached. The appellant contended that the account was attached to the amount of the debt only, leaving the balance free to be drawn against. On April 8, 1881, the garnishee order was discharged. POLLOCK, B., held that the whole amount of the moneys of the appellant held by the respondent was bound by the garnishee order, and gave judgment for the respondent.

- I LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I am not going to offer any opinion (I think it would be very unjustifiable, the question not being necessary to be determined here) upon the question whether it is competent to a judge to make a garnishee order attaching only a part of a debt. That is a very fit question to be discussed in the legislature perhaps, and to be argued before your Lordships if such a question shall arise. It is enough for me to say in reference to this case that the order as it is made, in the terms in which it is made, attaches all debts, that is to say, all money which Mr. Whiteley could be called upon to pay away, although more than the amount sufficient to satisfy the particular debt in question, and if he paid it away he would do so at his own risk, which of course he would not be bound to do. The order appears to me to have been in such terms that it would have been a disobedience to the order on his part if he had paid anything after it had been served upon him. That being so, it disposes of that part of the case which raised the question whether he was bound to pay while that order was in force. I think he was not. I think it would have been wrong to pay. Of course, therefore, while the debts were under that order of the court it would be impossible to say that he could be responsible for any damage if any damage was claimed as being caused to the plaintiff in this case. I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—The appellant impeaches a direction in law given by the judge, and also the verdict entered for the respondent, and maintains that he ought to have a new trial.

The respondent was owing the appellant, partly on deposit account and partly on account current, sums amounting in all to about £6,800, when he was served with a garnishee order at the instance of a judgment creditor of the appellant whose debt was £6,000. The appellant maintained at the trial that he was entitled, notwithstanding the order attaching the debt, to draw out the balance of £800. The attachment was in the form sanctioned by Ord. 45, r. 1, of "all debts owing or accruing due from the above-named garnishee to the above-named judgment debtor," and POLLOCK, B., ruled that so long as the attachment subsisted the respondent was under no legal obligation to pay the balance, or any part of it, upon the order of the appellant.

Many nice questions may arise in the application of Ord. 45, but I do not think the point which we are called upon to decide in this case is attended with the least difficulty. The effect of an order attaching "all debts" owing or accruing due by him to the judgment debtor is to make the garnishee custodian for the court of the whole funds attached; and he cannot, except at his own peril, part with any of those funds without the sanction of the court. Whether the order can in the first instance issue in other terms than those prescribed by the rules it is not necessary for the purposes of this case to decide; but I entertain no doubt that when the attachment has been made in these terms it is within the power of the court to restrict its operation to such an amount of the debts owing by the garnishee as will satisfy the judgment debt; but so long as such restriction is not made and the attachment is unreleased the garnishee is under no obligation to disregard the attachment and to pay the excess to his creditor.

At the Bar of the House the appellant mainly relied in argument upon the terms of the garnishee order, which he maintained did not lay an attachment upon the whole debts owing to him by the respondent, but only upon such part thereof as was sufficient to meet the judgment debt. The argument is so plainly untenable, that I think it unnecessary to take any further notice of it. I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I entirely agree in everything that has fallen from my noble and learned friends.

LORD MORRIS.—I entirely concur in the judgment which has been announced by the Lord Chancellor, and in the opinion of LORD WATSON. I only desire to add a few words as regards the dishonouring of the cheques. Upon the proper construction of the garnishee order, which has been relied upon by the respondent as a protection to him for having refused to pay the drafts of the appellant, it has been contended very forcibly by the learned counsel for the appellant that your Lordships should give what he suggests would be only a reasonable construction to the order in consequence of the irreparable mischief which might arise from giving it what would be apparently a fair construction of it upon the words as

A, they stand. He suggests that your Lordships should attach to the words "to answer" a meaning which would include "to the amount of the judgment recovered by the judgment creditor." I cannot concur in that contention, because in this order which is before your Lordships it is very plain upon the face of it that all debts due and owing by the above-named garnishee are attached to answer the judgment creditor's demand—that is, they are all captured for the purpose of afterwards answering the plaintiff's demand.

B I cannot, however, rest here without saying that, in my judgment, a great deal of the argument addressed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff can be answered if your Lordships are of opinion, as I am undoubtedly of opinion, that it would be quite competent for the judge in making the garnishee order (indeed in the particular state of facts which is alleged, he ought so to make the order) to make it so that the amount of the debts attached should only extend to an amount sufficient to answer the judgment. I can find nothing in the rule or Ord. 45 which limits the power and discretion of the learned judge to give an authority to attach all debts, and does not enable him to limit its operation to the amount of the judgment creditor's debt. I can see no objection to that course. It would appear to me to be quite open, upon the order, to the learned judge to take that course, and it would defeat all the arguments which, in my humble opinion, your Lordships cannot shut your eyes to, such as that a judgment creditor for a small amount of debt, say £5 or £10, might get a garnishee order to attach £50,000 in the bank in order to answer that small debt of £5 or £10.

D In this particular case which is now before your Lordships, it does not carry the appellant's case any further to call upon your Lordships to attach to the words "to answer" a meaning extending merely to the amount of the judgment debt. E If these words, or words to that effect, had been put in the order, they would have controlled it. However, no such words having been put into the order, I come to the conclusion that the order is an order extending to the entire amount of debts, and that the entire amount of debts is attached to answer the demand of the judgment creditor, and that it is not limited merely to the extent of his judgment debt. F With these observations I entirely concur in the proposed judgment.

LORD FIELD.—I am of opinion that this appeal has failed and upon the grounds which have been so clearly and fully stated by my noble and learned friends. I am quite satisfied, in this case, that the construction which has been put upon the order is the correct one. I do not think that the form of the order itself has in the present case been productive of any injustice whatever to the appellant. I am not quite prepared at this moment to say whether I would concur with what I understand to be the view of LORD MORRIS, namely, that it would be competent to a judge at chambers, upon the construction of this order, to make the limited garnishee order which he suggests; but I think it may well be a fit matter for the distinguished persons who have the making of these rules to consider whether or not some form of words might be adopted which would at the same time meet the possible injustice that might arise from this order and the fair interests of judgment creditors. As to the appeal now before your Lordships, I have no hesitation in saying that it ought to be dismissed.

LORD HANNEN.—I entirely concur in the opinions which have been expressed I by the Lord Chancellor and LORD WATSON. For the reasons which they have given, I think this appeal should be dismissed.

Costs—Security for costs—Plaintiff resident out of jurisdiction—No distinction between action on foreign judgment and other claim—Merits of action irrelevant on application for security for costs.

The rule by which a plaintiff resident outside the jurisdiction is usually required to give security for costs is applicable whether the action is on a foreign judgment or on some other claim.

On an application for security for costs against a plaintiff resident outside the jurisdiction the court cannot go into the merits of the action.

Appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (MATHEW and HENN COLLINS, JJ.), setting aside an order of GRANTHAM, J., in chambers, affirming an order of the master increasing the amount of the security for costs to be given by the plaintiff, a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, in an action by him against the defendants for a sum due under a judgment of a French court of first instance which had been affirmed by a French court of appeal.

At the commencement of the action the master ordered the plaintiff to give security for costs. The plaintiff's application for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, was refused and the defendants were given unconditional leave to defend on their allegation that the French judgment was obtained by fraud. The defendants then obtained from the master a further order increasing the amount of the plaintiff's security for costs, and that order was affirmed on appeal by GRANTHAM, J. The plaintiff then appealed to the Divisional Court against GRANTHAM, J.'s order and the Divisional Court set aside the order for increased security for costs. From that decision the defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Crump, Q.C., and Geary for the plaintiff.

A LORD ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion we cannot interfere with the decision of the learned judge at chambers ordering the plaintiff to give security for costs. The Divisional Court have set aside that order, and have held that the discretion exercised by the judge at chambers should be overruled. For my own part I am inclined to think that it is a matter of discretion, and that the court is not always bound as a matter of course to order security for costs to be given by a foreign plaintiff. That discretion, however, is always exercised in one way unless there are exceptional circumstances in the case. In the Divisional Court that discretion was exercised by refusing to order security for costs upon the ground that the plea disclosed no real defence to the action. That was a mistaken ground, for the plea if it is proved will be a complete defence. The Divisional Court, therefore, exercised their discretion upon a wrong ground, and this appeal must be allowed.

C LOPES, L.J.—In Re Percy and Kelly Nickel, Cobalt and Chrome Iron Mining Co. (1) (2 Ch.D. at p. 531), SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and in Pray v. Edie (2), BULLER, J., held that,

D "The principle is well established that a person instituting legal proceedings in this country, and being abroad, so that no adverse order could be effectually made against him if unsuccessful, is by the rules of the court compelled to give security for costs."

I have always understood that to be the rule, and that there is no difference between an action upon a foreign judgment and an action for any other debt. The Divisional Court have set aside the order of GRANTHAM, J., at chambers, and

E the learned judges in the Divisional Court seem to have done so upon different grounds. MATHEW, J., seems to have proceeded upon the ground that there was no real substantial defence to the action; but the plea is a good answer to the action if it is proved. I think that we must have come to that conclusion when the appeal under Ord. 14 came before us. The ground, therefore, upon which MATHEW, J., proceeded was erroneous. The ground upon which HENN COLLINS, J., proceeded was that there was a distinction between an action upon a foreign judgment and an action for an ordinary debt, and that in the former case there was a strong prima facie case in favour of the plaintiff. I think that there is no such distinction. The order of the Divisional Court was wrong, and must be reversed.

G DAVEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Counsel for the plaintiff has admitted that no authority can be found in the reports, or in textbooks, showing that the court has ever refused to order security for costs to be given by a foreign plaintiff suing in the courts of this country except in the well-known exceptional cases of a cross action, or where the money belonging to the plaintiff is already in the defendant's hands. I adopt the language of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., as quoted by LOPES, L.J. As to the ground upon which MATHEW, J., acted in the court

H below, I think that, upon an application against a foreign plaintiff for security for costs, the court cannot go into the merits at all. It would be very inconvenient to do so, and the rule upon which security for costs is ordered has nothing to do with the merits of the case. If, as was suggested, the defence discloses no defence at all, the plaintiff can apply to have it struck out as being frivolous, and disclosing no real defence to the action. As to the grounds upon which HENN COLLINS, J.,

I based his decision, I must confess that his judgment surprised me. There is no authority that I am aware of for saying that, where an order for security for costs is sought against a foreign plaintiff, there is any difference between an action on a foreign judgment and an action upon any other cause of action.

Judgment—Setting aside—Order—Jurisdiction to set aside order obtained by fraud.

A judge has no jurisdiction to alter an order which has been passed and entered and which expressed his real decision even though the order was obtained by fraud.

C

In a debenture-holders' action an order, dated Feb. 17, 1894, was made that the property comprised in the debentures should be sold by public auction. There were no bids for the property, and subsequently L., one of the debenture-holders, applied for an order that all further proceedings under the order of Feb. 17 should be carried out under the court's direction. By an order dated July 11, L.'s application was granted on condition that he paid into court £250 as security for costs in default of which it was ordered that the application should be dismissed with costs. L. did not pay in the money. On the sale of the property a sum became available for distribution among the debenture-holders, and on Aug. 7 L. applied to the judge who had made the order of July 11 asking that, notwithstanding that order, the costs directed to be paid by L. thereunder should be costs in the action, and that all further proceedings under the order of July 11 should be stayed. The ground of the application was that there had been misrepresentation as to the value of the property when the order of July 11 was made. At the date of the application of Aug. 7 the order of July 11 had been passed and entered and accurately expressed the intention of the court.

Held: the judge had no jurisdiction to re-hear the earlier application or to alter the order of July 11 made thereon.

B Appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster in an action by debenture-holders.

By an order dated Feb. 17, 1894, D. W. Allsup and F. L. Lindsay were appointed receivers and managers of the real and personal property of the defendant company, which was charged with three series of debentures. Lindsay was the holder of a debenture of the third series for £1,000, and was also a shareholder. By an order, dated June 4, a sale was directed, with the consent of the plaintiff company, out of court by public auction or private treaty, of the property of the defendant company comprised in the debentures. The property was afterwards offered for sale by auction, but no biddings were obtained. Lindsay subsequently applied for an order directing that all further proceedings under the order of June 4 might be carried out under the direction of the court. The summons was heard on July 11, when the Vice-Chancellor made an order directing that, if Lindsay, within one week from that date, paid into court to the credit of the action the sum of £250 as security for the costs of that application, it should be referred to the registrar to appoint some fit and proper person to conduct the sale of the property out of court, but in case Lindsay did not pay in the £250 within the time mentioned, then the application should be dismissed with costs. Lindsay did not pay the £250 into court. On Aug. 7 he took out a summons asking that, notwithstanding the order of July 11, the costs thereby directed to be paid by him should be costs in the action, and that all further proceedings under that order might be stayed.

At the date of this summons the order of July 11 had been passed and entered, but the assets of the defendant company had been sold, and some of the proceeds were available for distribution among the holders of the debentures of the third series, and the ground of the application was that when the order of July 11 was obtained, there had been a misrepresentation to the court as to the value of the assets. The Vice-Chancellor held that he had no jurisdiction to make the order asked by the summons of Aug. 7, and from this decision Lindsay appealed.

Hopkinson, Q.C., and Mansfield for Lindsay.

G Humber for the plaintiffs.

Astbury for the defendants and Allsup.

LORD HALSBURY.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. If by mistake an order has been drawn up which does not express the intention of the court, the court must have jurisdiction to correct the mistake. But this was an application to the Vice-Chancellor to re-hear an application and alter an order which he intended to make, but which it is said he ought not to have made. Even when an order has been obtained by fraud, it has been held that the court has no jurisdiction to re-hear it. If such a jurisdiction existed, it would be most mischievous. The fact that in the present case the application to re-hear was made to the particular judge who made the order is immaterial. For, if one judge can re-hear and alter the order, another can. Any application which may be made to the Vice-Chancellor for an order in the nature of a supplemental order is, of course, still within his jurisdiction, but he has no jurisdiction to re-hear or alter this order.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a matter of some importance with reference to the practice and procedure of the court. This is not an application to alter an order on the ground of some slip or oversight, nor is it a case in which the order has not been drawn up. Here the order has been passed and entered, and, it expresses the real decision of the judge, and that being so, the judge has no jurisdiction to alter it. If this summons had proceeded on the theory that the order of July 11 was right, or that circumstances had since occurred which had rendered a supplemental order necessary, the court might have entertained the application; but this summons proceeds on the theory that the order made on July 11 was wrong. In my opinion it is of the utmost importance that there should be a finality to litigation when once the order has been completed. The appeal must be dismissed with costs, but without prejudice to any application which Lindsay may make to the Vice-Chancellor, that the costs which he has been ordered to pay may be taken out of the proceeds of the sale of the company's assets.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that the Vice-Chancellor was right in arriving at the conclusion that he had no jurisdiction in this matter. This is not an application to re-hear a matter before the order has been drawn up; nor is it an application to vary an order which has been drawn up not in accordance with the order pronounced by the judge; nor is it an application that the judge should make an order supplemental to the order drawn up. This is an application that he should re-hear the matter and make a different order. In my opinion the judge had no jurisdiction to do that. It was said that NORTH, J., had decided the contrary in Staniar v. Evans (1). But at the date of that decision Re Suffield and Watts, Ex parte Brown (2) had not been decided by the Court of Appeal, and Re St. Nazaire Co. (3), upon which FRY, L.J., relied in the former case, was not brought to the notice of the learned judge. Staniar v. Evans (1) is not now before the court. If it were, in my judgment, it would require re-consideration. FRY, L.J., put the law on the right foundation when he held that a judge ceased to have jurisdiction over a judgment or order when once it was perfected. In my opinion the Vice-Chancellor had no jurisdiction to do what he was asked to do in this case, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Pleading—Particulars—Failure to deliver within time ordered—Jurisdiction to impose terms limiting time for delivery of particulars—Jurisdiction to dismiss action on ground that frivolous and vexatious—"Pleadings"—Inclusion of particulars—R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 7—R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4.

On May 30, 1892, in an action brought for money alleged to be due in respect of services alleged to have been performed by the plaintiff for the defendant at his request, the plaintiff was ordered to deliver particulars of his claim. On June 15 an order was made for the delivery of the particulars within ten days. On July 4 an order was made that the action should be dismissed unless the particulars were delivered within seven days. On July 20 an order was made that, unless proper particulars were delivered within ten days, the claim should be struck out. On Aug. 4 the defendant took out a summons asking that the claim might be struck out under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, as frivolous and vexatious, and that the action might be dismissed unless proper particulars pursuant to the previous orders were delivered within seven days. On Aug. 10 the master dismissed the action with costs. The judge at chambers affirmed this order. The Divisional Court ordered the action to be dismissed unless the plaintiff delivered particulars within fifteen days. The plaintiff delivered no particulars under this last order, but appealed.

Held: (i) in the exercise of the inherent power of the court, the action was rightly dismissed as frivolous and vexatious; (ii) R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 7, empowered the court to impose terms as to the time in which particulars were to be delivered and as to dismissal of the action if they were not delivered within the limited time, and, therefore, the master had jurisdiction to make the order dismissing the action.

Semble, that, in Ord. 25, r. 4, the word "pleadings" included particulars.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (MATHEW and BRUCE, JJ.), dismissing the action unless proper particulars of the plaintiff's claim were delivered within fifteen days.

I

The action was brought for money alleged to be due in respect of services alleged to have been performed by the plaintiff for the defendant at his request, and on an account stated between them in respect of the alleged services. On May 30, 1892, an order was made by the master for delivery by the plaintiff of particulars of his claim. On June 15 a further order was made for their delivery within ten days. On July 4 an order was made that the action should be dismissed unless the plaintiff delivered particulars within a week. On July 20, the particulars delivered being deemed insufficient, an order was made that, unless proper particulars were delivered within ten days, certain paragraphs of the statement of claim should be struck out. The particulars afterwards delivered being deemed insufficient, a summons was taken out on Aug. 4 (i) to strike out the statement of claim under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, on the ground that it was frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court; (ii) to dismiss the action with costs unless the plaintiff within seven days should deliver proper particulars pursuant to the previous orders. A

On Aug. 10 an order was made by the master dismissing the action with costs. This order was affirmed on appeal by the judge at chambers. The Divisional Court (MATHEW and BRUCE, JJ.), on the plaintiff's appeal, made an order dismissing the action with costs unless the plaintiff should deliver his particulars within fifteen days. The plaintiff delivered no particulars, but appealed to this court, and asked that the order of the master of Aug. 10, the order of the judge affirming it, and the order of the Divisional Court be set aside. LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the Divisional Court has ordered the action to be struck out. An order was made by a master and affirmed by the judge in chambers and by the Divisional Court. The summons taken out before the master was applied for upon two grounds; first, that the action was frivolous and vexatious; and secondly, that the particulars which were ordered to be given within a certain time were not delivered. In consequence of this an order was made that the action should be dismissed. It seems to me that, if either of those two preliminaries be made out, the master's order dismissing the action is right; that is to say, either if the action is frivolous or vexatious, or if particulars were not delivered within the limited time. D

As to the first point I think the order was right. An action may be dismissed as frivolous and vexatious in either one of two ways, namely, either under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court to prevent oppression. Whether this case comes within Ord. 25, r. 4, depends on the question whether particulars when ordered can be considered for the purpose of the rule to be part of the pleadings. I am inclined strongly to think that it is so, that Ord. 25, r. 4, is to be construed in the largest sense of the words, and when particulars have been delivered which show grounds on which a party to the action may make an application under the rule, then the action may be dismissed, or the defence struck out, as the case may be. But on the present occasion it is unnecessary to determine that point finally, because, in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction, the court may stop the proceedings at any stage if it thinks an action, or a defence as the case may be, is frivolous and vexatious. The court has an inherent authority and duty to protect a party to an action against frivolous and vexatious proceedings. In this case the plaintiff has brought an action for services performed by him for the defendant at his request, and upon an account stated between them in respect thereof. The plaintiff is then asked for particulars of the alleged services. If he has performed no services at all, he has no cause of action either in respect of the alleged services or of the account stated. He is pressed to give particulars of the services, and it is obvious that he must know when, where, and for whom he has performed them. He then delivers particulars which give no information whatever, and he has never given any particulars on which anyone could act. It appears to me that the reason he has not given any particulars is that he has none to give. Therefore, it seems to me that the action is frivolous and vexatious, and is rightly dismissed under the inherent power of the court. F G H

Then there is another point arising under Ord. 19, rr. 6 and 7. Rule 7 gives power to the court, in making an order for the delivery of particulars, to impose terms, at least as to the time in which they are to be given, and also as to dismissal in case the particulars are not given within the limited time. Therefore, it seems to me that the effect of the order of the master is to say that the action shall be dismissed if particulars are not given within the limited days. That order was within his jurisdiction, and on that ground also I think the action was rightly dismissed. I

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The action has been dismissed by an

A order of the master, by the judge at chambers, and by the Divisional Court; and I think it has been rightly dismissed. It has been contended before us that there are three grounds upon which the order may be justified. The first ground is Ord. 25, r. 4; the second is the inherent power of the court to dismiss an action when the procedure of the court is being abused; and the third is Ord. 19, rr. 6 and 7. It is not necessary now to determine whether particulars when ordered
B are part of a "pleading" within the meaning of that word as used in Ord. 25, r. 4, but I am inclined to think so. On the other two points I entirely agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, and I think this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Shipping—Deviation—Printed clause in bill of lading permitting call at number of ports—Limitation—Avoidance of interference with main intent and object of contract.

F Perishable goods were shipped from a port in the south of Spain to Liverpool under a bill of lading which contained a printed clause giving the ship "liberty to proceed to and stay at any port or ports in any rotation in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black Sea, or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Africa, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, and Ireland, for the purpose of delivering G coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever." After the cargo was loaded the ship proceeded, not westwards in the direction of Liverpool, but to a port in the north-east of Spain, and, owing to the delay so caused, the cargo was found to be damaged when it eventually arrived at Liverpool. In an action by the consignees against the shipowners for damages,

H Held: in construing the clause in the bill of lading it was legitimate to bear in mind (i) that it was a printed clause applicable to many voyages and not specially agreed on in relation to the particular voyage contemplated by the parties, and (ii) that the cargo was perishable; the main intent and object of the bill of lading must be considered, and the general, printed, words must be limited so as not to conflict with that intent and object; the printed words must, accordingly, be limited so as only to confer a liberty to proceed to and stay at ports which were in the course of the voyage between the south of Spain and Liverpool; and, therefore, the shipowners were in breach of the bill
I of lading, and the consignees' action succeeded.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.), reported [1892] 1 Q.B. 337, affirming a decision of HAWKINS, J.

Bigham, Q.C., Boyd and Glynn for the appellants.

J. Walton, Q.C., C. C. Scott and Cecil Carver for the respondents, were not called upon to address the House.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The question raised by this appeal is the construction to be put upon a bill of lading by which the appellant shipowners agreed to carry certain goods of the respondents. The shipowners allege that the court below erred in so construing their liability under the bill of lading as to hold that they had broken their contract by proceeding to a port called Burriana after they had taken on board the cargo shipped by the respondents.

A cargo of oranges was shipped at Malaga, and the bill of lading was in these terms:

"Shipped in good order and condition...in and upon the good steamship called the Zena...now lying in the port of Malaga, and bound for Liverpool...eight third cases of oranges."

The port to which the vessel proceeded after she left Malaga was not in the direction of Liverpool, but in the contrary direction taking the vessel farther away from Liverpool than she was at Malaga. Of course it could not be disputed that, if the words which I have read to your Lordships were the only words to be found in the

A bill of lading relating to the voyage, the shipowners could not justify their act in thus deviating from the stipulated voyage, and would be liable to the shippers in respect of any damage to their goods sustained in consequence of such deviation. In the present case, owing to the delay which took place before the vessel arrived at Liverpool, the oranges were very much damaged, and loss was consequently sustained.

B But the shipowners seek to justify the act of proceeding to Burriana by reason of these words which follow those which I have read :

"with liberty to proceed to and stay at any port or ports in any rotation in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black Sea, or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Africa, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain and Ireland, for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever."

C The contention of the appellants is, that under those words the voyage to Burriana was justified by the terms of the contract between the parties. It is admitted that the contention of the appellants goes to this length, that after the oranges were taken on board at Malaga upon a vessel said to be bound for Liverpool, the ship might have been sent to any port within the limits named or any number of those ports in any order, staying there any time she pleased, for the purpose of taking in cargo, or delivering it at any of those ports, and it is true that, if their full and complete meaning be given to the words used, that will be the consequence of giving them that meaning. The question is whether they ought to be so construed, or whether there is any reason for putting a restriction upon their construction.

These words are printed words in a document evidently intended to be used in relation to a variety of contracts of affreightment. The name of the particular port of shipment as well as the goods to be shipped is left in blank, and these words are treated as a liberty which is to attach to the particular voyage which is agreed upon between the parties. But the main object and intent of the bill of lading is the voyage so agreed upon; and although it would not be legitimate to discard the printed words (indeed here the shipowners require the shippers to undertake to be bound by them as well as by the written words), yet it is well recognised that, in construing an instrument of this sort, and in considering what is its main intent and object, and what the interpretation ought to be from words connected with that main intent and object so expressed, it is legitimate to bear in mind that a portion of the contract is on a printed form applicable to many voyages, and is not specially agreed upon in relation to the particular voyage. The main object and intent, as I have said, of this bill of lading is the carriage of oranges from Malaga to Liverpool. That is the matter in which the shippers are concerned; and it seems to me that it would be to defeat what is the manifest object and intention of such a contract to hold that it was entered into with a power to the shipowners to proceed anywhere that they pleased, to trade in any manner that they pleased, and to arrive at the port at which the oranges were to be delivered when they pleased.

H Is there any rule of law which compels the construction contended for? I think there is not. Where general words are used which are obviously intended to be applicable, so far as they are applicable, to the circumstances of the particular contract, which particular contract is to be embodied in or introduced into that printed form, I think you are justified in looking at the main object and intent of the contract and in limiting the general words used, having in view that object and intent. Therefore, it seems to me that the construction contended for would be an unreasonable one, and there is no difficulty in construing this clause to apply to a liberty in the performance of the stipulated voyage to call at a particular port or ports in the course of the voyage. That port or those ports would differ according to what the stipulated voyage is, inasmuch as at the time when this document is framed the parties who frame it do not know what the particular voyage will be, and intend it to be equally used whatever that voyage is. The ports, a visit to which would be justified under this contract will no doubt differ according to the particular voyage stipulated for between the shipper and the shipowner; but it must, in my view, be a liberty consistent with the main object of the contract, a liberty only to proceed to and stay at the ports which are in the course of the voyage. In saying that, I am speaking in a business sense. It may be said that no port is directly in the course of the voyage (indeed that was argued by the learned counsel for the appellants) inasmuch as in merely entering a port or approaching it nearly you deviate from the direct course between the port of shipment and the ultimate port of destination. That is perfectly true; but in a business sense it would be perfectly well understood to say that there were certain ports in the way between Malaga and Liverpool, and those are the ports at which I think the right to touch and stay is given.

Then it is said that this may be done "in any rotation." I do not think that that carries the matter any further. When once the conclusion which I have indicated is arrived at, if the meaning to be given to those words is such that the vessel may take those ports in any order she pleases in a reasonable sense, nevertheless the ports referred to must still, in my opinion, be ports lying between Malaga and the port of destination, Liverpool, even although there might be justification for her not touching at any particular one of those ports, or more than one of them, in the exact order in which they would come in the voyage between those two places. It is not necessary to decide what effect should be given to those words "in any rotation"; but, even giving to them the fullest possible effect, they do not seem to me to enlarge the number of ports at which it would be justifiable for this vessel to touch during the course of her voyage. It is to be observed that the liberty which is given is not a liberty simpliciter to proceed to those ports. Purposes are mentioned; and the first which is mentioned is "for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers." It is exclusively for the "delivering of coals, cargo, or passengers." It is true those words are followed by the words "or for any other purpose whatsoever," but I am by no means satisfied that, when you find liberty given to proceed to certain ports "for the purpose of delivering" and "for any other purpose whatsoever," you must not put a limitation upon those words "any other purpose whatsoever," and that it would be legitimate to deduce from them the conclusion that there was authority to the shipowner to proceed to any of those ports for the purpose of taking in cargo as well as delivering it. It is impossible to conceive why there should be this mention of the delivery of cargo, as the thing first mentioned in dealing with the purpose for which the vessel might proceed to these ports, if she was to be at liberty either to take in or to discharge cargo; and it seems to me to throw light at all events upon the construction which ought to be put upon the language used, because the delivering of coals, cargo, or passengers points to the carrying out of a voyage already determined upon in relation to a cargo already on board.

I do not put that before your Lordships as by any means the governing consideration, because I am led to the conclusion at which I have arrived upon the same grounds as those which have been so very clearly and fully expressed by the learned judges in the court below. I find myself so completely in agreement with the reasons which they have given that I do not think it necessary to trouble your Lordships with any further observation. I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD HALSBURY.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that, in construing this document, which is a contract of carriage between the parties, one must in the first instance look at the whole of the instrument and not at one part of it only.

Looking at the whole of the instrument, and seeing what one must regard, for a reason which I will give in a moment, as its main purpose, one must reject words, indeed whole provisions, if they are inconsistent with what one assumes to be the main purpose of the contract. The main purpose of the contract was to take on board at one port, and to deliver at another port a perishable cargo. I do

A not think the learned counsel who argued this case on the part of the appellants gave sufficient effect in the argument which he addressed to your Lordships to the difference between the ordinary and formal parts of the document which are to be found in print and the written parts; indeed, I gathered from him at one time that he rather contested the legitimacy of considering the difference whether the words were in print or in writing. I suppose that that doubt which he appeared to intimate was justified by the terms of this particular document; because the fact that in the ordinary construction of a commercial document such a principle as I have mentioned has been adopted for something like a century cannot be a matter of doubt; and the reason for it appears to me to be very cogent and relevant to the case before your Lordships.

C I have in my hand the report of a case in the Court of King's Bench in the year 1803 (Robertson v. French (1)), in which LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., as it appears to me, gives with great precision the ground upon which one part of a document may be relied upon as controlling and cutting down the generality of the words in the other. His Lordship says (4 East, at pp. 135, 136):

D "In the course of the argument it seems to have been assumed that some peculiar rules of construction apply to the terms of a policy of assurance which are not equally applicable to the terms of other instruments and in all other cases. It is therefore proper to state upon this head that the same rule of construction which applies to all other instruments applies equally to this instrument of a policy of insurance, viz., that it is to be construed according to its sense and meaning as collected in the first place from the terms used in it, which terms are themselves to be understood in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense, unless they have generally in respect of the subject-matter, as by the known usage of trade or the like, acquired a peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the same words, or unless the context evidently points out that they must, in the particular instance and in order to effectuate the immediate intention of the parties to that contract, be understood in some other special and peculiar sense. The only difference between policies of assurance and other instruments in this respect is, that the greater part of the printed language of them being invariable and uniform has acquired from use and practice a known and definite meaning, and that the words superadded in writing (subject indeed always to be governed in point of construction by the language and terms with which they are accompanied) are entitled nevertheless, if there should be any reasonable doubt upon the sense and meaning of the whole, to have a greater effect attributed to them than to the printed words, inasmuch as the written words are the immediate language and terms selected by the parties themselves for the expression of their meaning, and the printed words are a general formality adapted equally to their case and that of all other contracting parties upon similar occasions and subjects."

H If one applies the principle of what LORD ELLENBOROUGH there says to the present case, it seems to me that the particular document which your Lordships are now construing was obviously intended to fulfil the function which the learned counsel himself very truly described, and there is no doubt, within the ambit of what the parties would contemplate, of the sort of voyage by which probably every one of the terms of the instrument would be satisfied. For my own part I should imagine I that where it was intended, at some of the distant ports referred to, to have a full and complete cargo taken on board, or that where they had intended from time to time to call at an intermediate port before going to the ultimate port to which the parties agreed, probably there is no one of the stipulations in this contract which would not receive its ample fulfilment. But when one applies it to the particular circumstances of this case in which the parties have in writing expressed the intention that there should be a delivery of goods (and the particular class of goods is not to be omitted from consideration—they were perishable goods taken from one port to another) it seems to me that to apply these general printed words

(which might in another case, as I say, receive complete fulfilment), as regards each of these stipulations, to the particular contract which the parties had immediately before them when they agreed to this contract as between carrier and customer, would manifestly defeat the very object which both the parties had in view. I also concur with the Lord Chancellor that the particular words which give the liberty are not to be rejected, not as in themselves forming a complete answer to the argument, but as forming part of that general consideration of the entire document which it is the duty of every court, so far as they can, to apply to a document under construction; and that appears to me again to refer to a liberty to deliver in the course of a voyage where the principal voyage has been agreed upon between the parties. A

Under these circumstances I do not desire to add anything, except to point out that the argument of counsel for the appellants, very lucid and able as it was, did somewhat of injustice when he said that BOWEN, L.J., had assumed something when he stated that it would make it impossible to insure the cargo if such a construction was adopted as was then insisted upon. BOWEN, L.J., said: B

"It would make it impossible to insure the cargo. It would make it impossible for the consignees of the cargo to know what to do as to taking delivery and to know what they were to do with the bills of lading." C

It seems to me that that which the learned counsel attributed to BOWEN, L.J., he has been guilty of himself. If he assumes that the construction is that which he contends for, his answer that nevertheless business does go on would be good enough; but he seems to forget that the question which we are considering is whether that is the construction. He must not first assume that that is the true construction and that business does go on nevertheless, which was his answer, but he must consider whether mercantile men when they do go on with business in this form do not recollect that a business sense will be given to business documents, and that, therefore, they are not under the peril of leaving it absolutely to the shipowner himself to do what he will with the cargo. Indeed the argument seems to me to assume that you might get rid of written documents altogether, inasmuch as both carrier and customer have such complete confidence in each other that, however wide and unreasonable may be the construction attributed to a written instrument between carrier and customer, they are not likely to disagree. D

If that is the argument, I am afraid that the records both of your Lordships' House and of all other courts do not favour that view. Undoubtedly both carrier and customer differ very widely sometimes as regards what is reasonable and what is not, and for that reason they call upon courts of law to construe sometimes somewhat loose and irregular instruments. For these reasons I agree in the motion which my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has made. E

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I agree. F

LORD SHAND.—I am also of opinion that this decision must be adhered to. It appears to me that, as it is clear that in this trade a number of perishable cargoes are constantly carried, that is a circumstance not to be lost sight of. In the Mediterranean undoubtedly in certain seasons of the year the main cargoes brought by these vessels are oranges, which are extremely liable to deterioration; and I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the reading which we have been asked to put upon this bill of lading is not only inconsistent with the object of the contract of carriage known to both parties, but would be entirely destructive of that object. I should like to add, with reference to a point which does not seem to have been discussed in the court below in regard to that clause of the bill of lading which speaks of the purpose for which calls may be made at the different ports, namely, that they may be "for the purpose of delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever," that while undoubtedly these words, as one looks at them in the first instance, would seem to suggest that it is the case of a vessel G

A which has taken on board all her cargo and is proceeding to deliver her cargo as she goes onwards, yet I should feel great difficulty in restraining those words, in the sense which has been contended for, to the case of delivering cargo only in such a case as the present. I suppose it is notorious that in these voyages on the Mediterranean vessels call at one port after another for the purpose of taking in cargo, and if a case occurred in which a shipper has sent it, it may be a small portion

B of oranges or other goods, on board a vessel which has got to fill up, I should have considerable difficulty in holding at the moment that the words used in the bill of lading as to delivering a cargo might not fairly include receiving a cargo in the course of the voyage. But, my Lords, that question is not before the House now, and I do not think that anything which has been said upon that subject forms a ground of decision in this case. I entirely concur in the other ground stated by

C your Lordships, and I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Malicious Falsehood—False statement about business of trader—General loss of business—Admissibility of evidence.

G

In an action on the case for falsehood producing damage to a man's trade, which, in its very nature, is intended or is reasonably likely to produce, and in the ordinary course of things does produce, a general loss of business as distinct from the loss of particular customers, evidence of such general loss of business is admissible and is sufficient to sustain the action.

H

Per BOWEN, L.J. That an action will lie for written or oral falsehoods not actionable per se nor even defamatory, where they are maliciously published, where they are calculated in the ordinary course of things to produce, and where they do produce, actual damage, is established law. Such an action is not one of libel or of slander, but an action on the case for damage wilfully and intentionally done without just occasion or excuse, analogous to an action for slander of title.

B Application to enter judgment for the defendant, or for a new trial, by way of appeal from the verdict and judgment in an action tried before Mr. Commissioner BOMPAS, Q.C., and a jury at Chester.

The plaintiff, in his statement of claim, alleged that he had for a long time carried on the business, at Hawarden, in the county of Flint, of an engineer and boiler-maker, under the name of "Ratcliffe & Sons," having become entitled to the goodwill of the business upon the death of his father, who, with others, had

C previously carried on the same business under the same name. The defendant was the registered proprietor, publisher, and printer of a weekly newspaper, called the "County Herald," which circulated in Flintshire and some of the adjoining counties. The plaintiff alleged that he had suffered damage by the defendant falsely and maliciously publishing and printing of the plaintiff, in relation to his business, in the "County Herald," certain words, which were as follows:

D "An event of a very pleasant and interesting nature occurred at the new station of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway at Hawarden on Saturday last, the 26 ult. It had been whispered abroad for a few days previous that Mr. Edward Ratcliffe of that village intended having a storeyard at this station, and the fact was fully demonstrated when, on the afore-mentioned date, a large crowd of persons assembled to witness the arrival and unloading operation of a large steel boiler at Hawarden. This boiler is a specially constructed one, capable of working at 100 lb. pressure, and was purchased by

E Mr. Ratcliffe in Sheffield, and consigned direct to its destination. We may mention that, although Mr. Edward Ratcliffe has superintended the building of hundreds of boilers when connected with the firm of Ratcliffe & Sons (which firm is now unfortunately extinct), yet this is the first time he has had the

At the trial, the learned commissioner allowed the statement of claim to be amended by adding the words

G "by reason of the premises the plaintiff was injured in his credit and reputation, and in his said business of an engineer and boiler-maker, and he thereby lost profits which he otherwise would have made in his said business."

The plaintiff proved a general falling off and loss of business since the publication of the statement complained of, but gave no specific evidence of the loss of any particular customers or orders by reason of the publication. In answer to questions put to them by the learned commissioner, the jury found that the words did not

H reflect upon the plaintiff's character, and were not libellous; that the statement that the firm of "Radcliffe & Sons" was extinct was not published bona fide; and that the plaintiff's business suffered damage to the extent of £120 by reason of the publication of that statement. The learned commissioner, upon these findings, gave judgment for the plaintiff for £120. The defendant applied for judgment or for a new trial, on the ground that the evidence of general loss of business was

I improperly admitted, and that there was no evidence of any such special damage as was necessary to support the action.

May 26, 1892. BOWEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This was a case in which an action for a false and malicious publication about the trade and manufactures of the plaintiff was tried at the Chester Assizes, with the result of a verdict for the plaintiff for £120. Judgment having been entered for the plaintiff for that sum and costs, the defendant appealed to this court for a new trial, or to enter verdict for the defendant, on the ground, amongst others, that no special damage, such as was necessary to support the action, was proved at the trial [but see now s. 3 of the Defamation Act, 1952]. The injurious statement complained of was a publication in the "County Herald," a Welsh newspaper. It was treated in the pleadings as a defamatory statement or libel, but this suggestion was negatived, and the verdict of the jury proceeded upon the view that the writing was a false statement purposely made about the manufactures of the plaintiff, which was intended to, and did in fact, cause him damage. The only proof at the trial of such damage consisted, however, of evidence of general loss of business, without specific proof of the loss of any particular customer or orders, and the question we have to determine is whether in such an action such general evidence of damage was admissible and sufficient.

That an action will lie for written or oral falsehoods not actionable per se nor even defamatory, where they are maliciously published, where they are calculated in the ordinary course of things to produce, and where they do produce, actual damage, is established law. Such an action is not one of libel or of slander, but an action on the case for damage wilfully and intentionally done without just occasion or excuse, analogous to an action for slander of title. To support it actual damage must be shown, for it is an action which only lies in respect of such damage as has actually occurred. It was contended before us that in such an action it is not enough to allege and prove general loss of business arising from the publication, since such general loss is general, and not special, damage; and special damage—as has often been said—is the gist of such an action on the case.

Lest we should be led astray in such a matter by mere words, it is desirable to recollect that the term "special damage," which is found for centuries in the books, is not always used with reference to similar subject-matter nor in the same context. At times (both in the law of tort and of contract) it is employed to denote that damage arising out of the special circumstances of the case which, if properly pleaded, may be superadded to the general damage which the law implies in every breach of contract and every infringement of an absolute right: see Ashby v. White (1). In all such cases the law presumes that some damage will flow in the ordinary course of things from the mere invasion of the plaintiff's rights, and calls it general damage. Special damage in such a context means the particular damage (beyond the general damage) which results from the particular circumstances of the case and of the plaintiff's claim to be compensated, for which he ought to give warning in his pleadings, in order that there may be no surprise at the trial. But where no actual and positive right (apart from the damage done) has been disturbed, it is the damage done that is the wrong; and the expression "special damage," when used of this damage, denotes the actual and temporal loss which has in fact occurred. Such damage is called variously in old authorities "express loss," "particular damage" (Cane v. Golding (2)), "damage in fact," "special or particular cause of loss" (Harwood v. Lowe (3); Tasburgh v. Day (4)).

The term "special damage" has also been used in actions on the case brought for a public nuisance, such as the obstruction of a river or a highway, to denote that actual and particular loss which the plaintiff must allege and prove that he has sustained (beyond what is sustained by the general public) if his action is to be supported, such particular loss being, as is obvious, the cause of action: see Iveson v. Moore (5); Rose v. Groves (6). In this judgment we shall endeavour to avoid a term which, intelligible enough in particular contexts, tends when successively employed in more than one context, and with regard to different subject-matter, to encourage confusion in thought. The question to be decided does not depend on words, but is one of substance.

In an action like the present, brought for a malicious falsehood intentionally published in a newspaper about the plaintiff's business—a falsehood which is not actionable as a personal libel, and which is not defamatory in itself—is evidence to

- A show that a general loss of business has been the direct and natural result admissible in evidence, and, if uncontradicted, sufficient to maintain the action? In the case of a personal libel such general loss of custom may unquestionably be alleged and proved. Every libel is of itself a wrong, in regard to which the law, as we have seen, implies general damage. By the very fact that he has committed such a wrong the defendant is prepared for the proof that some general damage may have been done. As is said by GOULD, J., in Iveson v. Moore (5), in actions against a wrongdoer a more general mode of declaring is allowed. If, indeed, over and above this general damage, further particular damage is, under the circumstances, to be relied on by the plaintiff, such particular damage must, of course, be alleged and shown. But a loss of general custom flowing directly and in the ordinary course of things from a libel may be alleged and proved generally.
- C POLLOCK, C.B., said in Harrison v. Pearce (7) (32 L.T.O.S. at p. 298):

“That is not special damage—it is general damage arising from the kind of injury the plaintiff has sustained.”

- D So in Bluck v. Lovering (8), under a general allegation of loss of credit in business, general evidence was received of a decline of business, presumably due to the publication of the libel, while loss of particular customers, not having been pleaded, was held rightly to have been rejected at the trial: see also Ingram v. Lawson (9).

- E Akin to—though distinguishable, in a respect which will be mentioned, from—actions of libel are those actions which are brought for oral slander, where such slander consists of words actionable in themselves, and the mere use of which constitutes the infringement of the plaintiff's right. The very speaking of such words, apart from all damage, constitutes a wrong, and gives rise to a cause of action. The law in such a case, as in the case of libel, presumes and in theory allows proof of general damage. But slander, even if actionable in itself, is regarded as differing from libel in a point which renders proof of general damage in slander cases difficult to be made good. A person who publishes defamatory matter on paper or in print puts in circulation that which is more permanent and more easily transmissible than oral slander. Verbal defamatory statements
- F may indeed be intended to be repeated, or may be uttered under such circumstances that their repetition follows in the ordinary course of things from their original utterance. Except in such cases the law does not allow the plaintiff to recover damages which flow, not from the original slander, but from its unauthorised repetition: see Ward v. Weeks (10); Holwood v. Hopkins (11); Dixon v. Smith (12). General loss of custom cannot properly be proved in respect of a slander of this kind when it has been uttered under such circumstances that its repetition does not flow directly and naturally from the circumstances under which the slander itself was uttered. The doctrine that in slanders actionable per se general damage may be alleged and proved with generality must be taken therefore with the qualification that the words complained of must have been spoken under circumstances which might in the ordinary course of things have directly
- H produced the general damage that has in fact occurred.

- I Evans v. Harries (13) was a slander uttered in such a manner. It consisted of words reflecting on an innkeeper in the conduct of his business spoken openly in the presence of divers persons, guests and customers of the inn, a floating and transitory class. The court held that general evidence of the decline of business was rightly receivable. MARTIN, B., said (1 H. & N. at p. 254):

“How is a public-house keeper, whose only customers are persons passing by, to show a damage resulting from the slander, unless he is allowed to give general evidence of loss of custom?”

M'Loughlin v. Welsh (14) was an instance of excommunication in open church. General proof was held to be rightly admitted that the plaintiff was shunned and his mill abandoned, though no loss of particular customers was shown. Here the very nature of the slander rendered it necessary that such general proof should be allowed. The defamatory words were spoken openly and publicly, and were intended to have the exact effect which was produced. Unless such general evidence was admissible, the injury done could not be proved at all. If in addition to this general loss, the loss of particular customers was to be relied on, such particular losses would, in accordance with the ordinary rules of pleading, have been required to be mentioned in the statement of claim: see Ashley v. Harrison (15). A

From libels and slanders actionable per se, we pass to the case of slanders not actionable per se, where actual damage done is the very gist of the action. Many old authorities may be cited for the proposition that in such a case the actual loss must be proved specially and with certainty: Harwood v. Lowe (3). Many such instances are collected in the judgments in Iveson v. Moore (5), where, although there was a difference as to whether the general rule had been fulfilled in that particular kind of action on the case, no doubt was thrown on the principle itself. As was there said—in that language of old pleaders which has seen its day, but which connoted more accuracy of legal thought than is produced by modern statements of claim— B

“damages in the per quod, where the per quod is the gist of the action, should be shown certainly and specially.” C

But such a doctrine as this was always subject to the qualification of good sense and of justice. Cases may here (as before) occur where a general loss of custom is the natural and direct result of the slander, and where it is not possible to specify particular instances of the loss. D

Hartley v. Herring (16) is probably a case of the kind; although it does not appear from the report under what circumstances or in the presence of whom the slanderous words were uttered. But if the words are uttered to an individual and repetition is not intended except to a limited extent, general loss of custom cannot be ordinarily a direct and natural result of the limited slander: see Dixon v. Smith (12); Hopwood v. Thorn (17). The broad doctrine is stated in BULLER'S NISI PRIUS at p. 7, that where words are not actionable and the special damage is the gist of the action, saying generally that several persons left the plaintiff's house is not laying the special damage. Slanders of title, written or oral, and actions such as the present brought for damage done by falsehoods, written or oral, about a man's goods or business are similar in many respects to the last-mentioned class of slanders, not actionable in themselves. Damage is the gist of both actions alike, and it makes no difference in this respect whether the falsehood is oral or in writing: see Malachy v. Soper (18). The necessity of alleging and proving actual temporal loss with certainty and precision in all cases of the sort has been insisted upon for centuries: Harwood v. Lowe (3); Cane v. Golding (2); Tasburgh v. Day (4); Evans v. Harlow (19). But it is an ancient and established rule of pleading that the question of generality of pleading must depend on the general subject-matter: see J'Anson v. Stuart (20); Lord Arlington v. Merricke (21); Grey v. Friar (22); Westwood v. Cowne (23); Iveson v. Moore (5). E

In all actions accordingly on the case where the damage actually done is the gist of the action, the character of the acts themselves which produce the damage and the circumstances under which these acts are done, must regulate the degree of certainty and particularity with which the damage done ought to be stated and proved. As much certainty and particularity must be insisted on, both in pleading and proof of damage, as is reasonable, having regard to the circumstances and to the nature of the acts themselves by which the damage is done. To insist upon less would be to relax old and intelligible principles. To insist upon more would be the vainest pedantry. The rule to be laid down with regard to malicious falsehoods affecting property or trade is only an instance of the doctrines of good sense applicable to all that branch of actions on the case to which the class under discussion belongs. The nature and circumstances of the publication of the falsehood may accordingly require the admission of evidence of general loss F

A of business, as the natural and direct result produced, and perhaps intended to be produced.

An instructive illustration, and one by which the present appeal is really covered, is furnished by Hargrave v. Le Breton (24), decided a century and a half ago. It was an action of slander of title at an auction. The allegation in the declaration was that divers persons who would have purchased at the auction left the place; but no particular persons were named. The objection that they were not specially mentioned was, as the report tells us, "easily" answered. The answer given was that in the nature of the transaction it was impossible to specify names; that the injury complained of was in effect that the bidding at the auction had been prevented and stopped; and that everybody had gone away. It had, therefore, become impossible to tell with certainty who would have been bidders or purchasers if the auction had not been rendered abortive. This case shows, what sound judgment itself dictates, that in an action for falsehood producing damage to a man's trade, which in its very nature is intended or reasonably likely to produce, and which in the ordinary course of things does produce, a general loss of business as distinct from the loss of this or that known customer, evidence of such general decline of business is admissible. In Hargrave v. Le Breton (24) it was a falsehood openly promulgated at an auction. In the case before us to-day it is a falsehood openly disseminated through the press, probably read and possibly acted on by persons of whom the plaintiff never heard. To refuse with reference to such subject-matter to admit such general evidence would be to misunderstand and warp the meaning of old expressions; to depart from and not to follow old rules; and, in addition to all this, would involve an absolute denial of justice and of redress for the very mischief which was intended to be committed.

It may be added that, so far as the decision in Riding v. Smith (25) can be justified, it must be justified on the ground that the court, rightly or wrongly, believed the circumstances under which the falsehood was uttered to have brought it within the scope of a similar principle. In our opinion, therefore, there has been no misdirection and no improper admission of evidence, and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Divorce—Condonation—Defined—Conclusion of fact, not law—Effect of knowledge of forgiving spouse, acquired subsequent to condonation, of other conjugal offences.

Condonation is a conclusion of fact, not of law, and it means the complete forgiveness and blotting out of a conjugal offence followed by cohabitation, the whole being done with full knowledge of the particular offence forgiven. Condonation of that offence stands good, with all its consequences, although the forgiving spouse has since been made aware of other offences committed by the other spouse which were unknown to the forgiving spouse at the time of the condonation, as to which every remedy remains.

Where a husband has condoned the adultery of his wife with a co-respondent the condonation operates as a bar to a claim by him for damages against the co-respondent.

Application by the husband for the new trial of a suit for divorce brought by him against his wife and two co-respondents. Sampson and Turner, or that the judgment of SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., might be varied.

- H At the trial the jury found that the wife had committed adultery with both the co-respondents, but that the husband had condoned the adultery with Turner. The evidence showed that at the time of the condonation the husband did not know of the adultery with Sampson. Damages were claimed against Turner alone, but the learned President did not direct the jury to assess any, and they did not do so. He granted a decree nisi with costs as regarded the adultery with Sampson,
- I but took time to consider his decision with regard to Turner. He delivered his judgment on June 19, 1893, when he said that it had been argued on behalf of the husband that, as at the time of the condonation of the adultery with Turner, the husband did not know of the adultery with Sampson, there had been no condonation, and that, on that ground, even as against Turner, the petition should not be dismissed. The question turned on the true construction of ss. 29, 30, and 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. The language of those sections appeared, as regards allegations of adultery and condonation, to treat the charge against each co-respondent, where there were more than one, as a separate complaint, and, if the adultery so complained of be proved, to direct that the decree should be pronounced, but, if such adultery be further shown to have been condoned, to direct that the petition, as regards such complaint, should be dismissed. It was consonant with good sense to say that an offence known and forgiven was not the less condoned because there might have been other offences which were not known or forgiven, and as to which every remedy remained. The husband's claim for damages against Turner fell with the petition for divorce, and, as against Turner, the petition was dismissed with costs. The husband appealed.

LOPES, L.J.—The petitioner prayed for a divorce from his wife on the ground of her adultery with the two co-respondents (Turner and Sampson), claiming damages from Turner and costs against both co-respondents. Divers acts of adultery were alleged at divers times and divers places against both co-respondents. The respondent and the co-respondent Turner denied the charges of adultery, and Turner set up condonation by the petitioner of the adultery complained of with him. Adultery with both Turner and Sampson was proved. At the trial it was proved that the petitioner had condoned the adultery with Turner, but it was also proved that at the time of that condonation he did not know of the adultery with Sampson. The President, after hearing the evidence, dismissed the petition against Turner, on the ground that the petitioner had condoned the adultery of his wife with him, and refused to entertain the claim for damages made by the petitioner against Turner, and ordered that the petitioner should pay Turner's costs. The President granted a decree nisi against Sampson. No question arises in the case so far as it relates to Sampson. The petitioner now appeals against the decision of the President, so far as it relates to Turner, on the following grounds. His counsel contends that he is entitled to a new trial, because the President misdirected the jury in not telling them (i) that there was no evidence of legal condonation of the adultery with Turner, and because he should thereupon have granted a decree nisi; (ii) in not telling the jury that Turner was not entitled to rely upon condonation as an answer to the claim for damages; (iii) in not telling the jury that they must assess damages against Turner, whose costs the petitioner could not be legally ordered to pay.

With regard to the first point, it was contended that there could be no legal condonation of the wife's adultery with Turner, however complete and absolute the forgiveness, and however full and complete the knowledge of all the circumstances of that particular offence, if at the time of that condonation there was any other matrimonial offence of the wife unknown to the husband—in fact, that condonation, to be legal and effective, involved the knowledge by the husband of all the adulteries of the wife, with whomsoever committed, up to the time of the condonation; that he could not forgive one act of adultery, or the adultery with one person, all the facts and circumstances of which he well knew and, knowing, elected to forgive and resume cohabitation with his wife, unless he also knew all her matrimonial delinquencies then existing. This view of condonation is not supported by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which now regulates all proceedings for divorce, whether it be a mensa et thoro or a vinculo, nor, I think, by the authorities.

I will deal first with the Act. Sections 27 and 28 provide the new remedy for dissolution of marriage. They create a power which the ecclesiastical courts did not possess, a power totally new in England, s. 28 enacting that the adulterer is to be made a co-respondent, and, of course, the adulterers, if more than one. Section 29 declares it to be the duty of the court, upon a petition for dissolution of mar-

Ariage, to satisfy itself, not only of the facts charged in the petition, but also, among other things, whether or no the petitioner has "condoned" the adultery. I take that to mean the particular adultery relied upon—alleged to have been committed with the particular co-respondent charged with it. This is made more clear by s. 30, which deals with the dismissal of the petition, for it says the court shall dismiss the petition if it finds that the petitioner has during the marriage "condoned the adultery complained of." Complained of where? Surely in the petition and with the particular co-respondent charged with it; not adulteries of which the petitioner then had no knowledge and could not complain. Again, s. 31, dealing with the power of the court to pronounce a decree for dissolving the marriage, uses the words "has condoned the adultery complained of." I infer from the language of the Act that the legislature contemplated the case of adulteries known to the husband and complained of, and not other adulteries not known, and, therefore, not complained of; the former known and capable of being condoned; the latter not known and not capable of being condoned; and, with this state of things in their minds, advisedly provided for condonation in the one case and non-condonation in the other, never intending that no effective condonation should be possible unless all the matrimonial offences existing at the time were known to the forgiving party. As an abstract proposition it seems to me most unreasonable to say that you cannot forgive an offence, all the circumstances of which you know, unless at that time you are also acquainted with other delinquencies of the person forgiven. It would introduce into forgiveness such uncertainty—such a power of retraction and revocation—as would to a great extent make forgiveness no forgiveness at all.

E I now proceed to deal with the authorities. Dempster v. Dempster (2) was decided in 1861, and is an important case. It seems to me to make it clear that, up to that time, the question as to what amount of knowledge of conjugal offences is necessary to constitute legal condonation was an open question, upon which the learned judge (SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL), who decided that case, had not himself formed a concluded opinion. He deals with Durant v. Durant (3), Turton v. Turton (4), and Bramwell v. Bramwell (5), and says (2 Sw. & Tr. at p. 440):

G "If the dicta cited from Turton v. Turton (4) and Bramwell v. Bramwell (5) are to be taken literally, they dispose of the question; but, if they are to be construed with reference to the facts of those cases, and with reference to Durant v. Durant (3), they seem to me to leave it an open question whether adultery by a husband with A. may not be condoned, although he had previously been guilty of adultery with B., which at the time of the alleged condonation was unknown to the wife."

H In 1870 Alexandre v. Alexandre, Queen's Proctor Intervening (6), came before LORD PENZANCE. The petition alleged two charges of adultery, and alleged that neither of them had been condoned. The Queen's Proctor intervened, and proved condonation of one adultery, but not of the other, and the court made a decree absolute on the ground of the uncondoned adultery, notwithstanding the suppression of the material fact of condonation of the other adultery. That case proceeds on the assumption that one matrimonial offence may be condoned, notwithstanding the fact that at the time of such condonation there may be another matrimonial offence unknown to the other party to the marriage. LORD PENZANCE says (L.R. I 2 P. & D. at p. 167):

"As regards the adultery which resulted in the birth of a child, I think the facts now disclosed are a complete answer to the petitioner's claim to a decree, because he condoned it. But there is another charge of adultery, which was established on the first hearing, and which is not only not refuted now, but is really supported by what the respondent has told us."

The learned judge proceeds (ibid. at p. 168):

"Then substantially the charge of adultery at 7, Buckingham Place, is proved, and what answer is there to that adultery? It has never been condoned, because the husband never knew of it." A

The adultery in Buckingham Place was anterior to the condoned adultery, but was carefully concealed from the petitioner when he condoned the subsequent adultery. It is clear to my mind that LORD PENZANCE did not consider that to constitute legal condonation there must be knowledge of all the conjugal delinquencies. It is clear he took the contrary view. B

In 1858 Peacock v. Peacock (7) was decided. It was a petition for judicial separation. The respondent, among other defences, set up condonation. The Judge Ordinary (SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL) explained to the jury that condonation signified forgiveness of a conjugal offence with full knowledge of all particulars. It was not suggesting that the forgiving party need know more than all the particulars of the particular offence forgiven. C

In 1859 Keats v. Keats and Montezuma (8) came before the court. The respondent denied the adultery and pleaded condonation, and the Judge Ordinary, addressing the jury on condonation, said (1 Sw. & Tr. at p. 346):

"Condonation means a 'blotting out of the offence imputed, so as to restore the offending party to the position which he or she occupied before the offence was committed.'" D

A person may forgive in the sense of not meaning to bear ill-will, or not seeking to punish, still being far from meaning to restore the guilty party to his or her original position. A master may forgive a clerk or a servant who has robbed him. He may say: "I forgive you," without having the slightest intention to restore him to the position he has forfeited. I take it that condonation would mean something more than that. To use the language of LORD STOWELL, it is like the releasing a debt; it makes it as if the debt had never existed. Again, with reference to condonation, it has been held that the person condoning must know of the offence, otherwise he cannot be supposed to condone it. The definition of condonation given by the Judge Ordinary was afterwards sought to be impeached before the full court, but the attempt failed. It will be observed that the learned judge uses the words "blotting out of the offence imputed." Nothing is said of other offences not known at the time of the condonation, the existence of which might make the condonation inoperative. E

It appears to me that to hold condonation effectual only where the forgiving party knew of all the delinquencies of the party forgiven would lead to results which show that such cannot be the true meaning of legal condonation. An injured husband prays dissolution of his marriage on account of his wife's adultery with A.; the wife admits the adultery and pleads condonation; the condonation is proved and petition dismissed. A year afterwards the same injured husband prays dissolution of his marriage on account of his wife's adultery with B. Adultery with B. is proved, such adultery being before the condoned adultery with A. What is to happen? The husband condoned the adultery with A., not knowing of the adultery with B.; the condonation cannot be recalled, for the petition has been dismissed, and no fresh proceeding can be taken against A. If the contention of the husband here was maintained, the condonation of the adultery with A. would be inoperative, because there was existing at the time of the condonation adultery with B., of which the condoning husband knew nothing. But if the condonation of the adultery with A. is to be operative in the case I have put, it is simply operative, if the plaintiff's contention is supported, because there have been two petitions instead of one making A. and B. both co-respondents. Condonation is a conclusion of fact, not of law, and, in my judgment, means the complete forgiveness and blotting out of a conjugal offence, followed by cohabitation, the whole being done with full knowledge of all the circumstances of the particular offence forgiven. The husband, in my opinion, need not be aware of all the acts of adultery committed by the wife when he forgives her any particular act of adultery. Condonation means F G H I

A a full and absolute forgiveness, with knowledge of all that is forgiven—it does not operate as a forgiveness of other unknown adulteries; but, on the other hand, there is no reason why it should not stand good although the husband has since been made aware of other adulteries committed by the wife, which were unknown to him at the time of the condonation, and as to which every remedy remains.

B On this point I think the learned President rightly directed the jury, and properly dismissed the petition against Turner, so far as it related to the prayer for dissolution of the marriage. But it is said, and strongly urged as a second point on behalf of the husband, that, assuming that the learned President was right in holding that there was evidence of condonation, and that the jury rightly found condonation, still, the adultery of the wife with Turner being proved, the husband was entitled to damages, notwithstanding the condonation, and that the C President ought so to have directed the jury. It was contended that condonation is no bar to the recovery of damages where the adultery is proved and damages are claimed, but that the same principle is to be applied as in the old action of criminal conversation. It is necessary to consider the law applicable to the old action of criminal conversation, and also the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, especially s. 33 of that Act. It is true that s. 59 of the Act abolishes the old D action of criminal conversation, but, inasmuch as the principles of law and rules of practice which governed it are to apply to a claim for damages substituted for it by s. 33 [see now s. 30 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950] it is necessary to consider what the law and practice were upon the subject. The injured husband was entitled to recover compensation in damages for the loss of the society, comfort, and assistance of his wife in consequence of the adultery. E The injured husband must have come into court with clean hands. How far his misconduct was an answer to the action, or only went in mitigation of damages, was a question about which different opinions were entertained. The wife was no party to the action. If illicit intercourse was had with the wife and the husband was not privy to it at the time, but knew of it afterwards and then received her back, the subsequent reconciliation went only in mitigation of damages: per F DE GREY, C.J., in Howard v. Burtonwood (9). This was agreed to by the court in Duberley v. Gunning (10), and said by BULLER, J., in that case to be settled law. Therefore, before the Act of Parliament most clearly condonation was only available by the adulterer in mitigation of damages, and was no answer to the action; and the injured husband, however much he had forgiven his wife, could bring his action against the adulterer, and recover damages, the condonation only going in G mitigation.

How far has this state of the law been altered by the Act of 1857? Section 59 abolishes the old action of criminal conversation; it enacts by s. 33, as regards the claim for damages, that it shall be heard and tried on the same principles, in the same manner, and subject to the same or the like rules and regulations as actions for criminal conversation at the time of the Act coming into operation were H tried and decided in courts of law. It was an inseparable incident of the old action that condonation was no answer to the action, and only went in mitigation of the damages. Is there anything in the Act to show that this state of the law was no longer to exist? Sections 27 to 31 deal with petitions for dissolution of marriage in cases where no damages are claimed, s. 30 enacting that, in case the petitioner has condoned the adultery complained of, then the court shall dismiss I the petition. That the court is compelled so to proceed where no damages are claimed is clear. But what is to happen if damages are claimed? This depends on the construction of s. 33. That section permits the injured husband to claim damages against the adulterer in a petition for dissolution of marriage or judicial separation, or in a petition limited to damages only. Such petition is to be served on the alleged adulterer and the wife, and then follow these words:

“and the claim made by every such petition shall be heard and tried on the same principles, in the same manner, and subject to the same or the like rules and regulations, as actions for criminal conversation are now tried and decided in courts of common law; and all the enactments herein contained with reference to the hearing and decision of petitions to the court shall, so far as may be necessary, be deemed applicable to the hearing and decision of petitions presented under this enactment. . . ."

Did the legislature, when it is said that the claim made by every such petition was to be heard and tried on the same principles as actions for criminal conversation, intend to make condonation, which had never before been a defence in actions of criminal conversation, an answer to the claim for damages? If there was nothing more in the section, I should say certainly not; but then follow these words:

"and all the enactments herein contained with reference to the hearing and decision of petitions to the court shall, so far as may be necessary, be deemed applicable to the hearing and decision of petitions presented under this enactment."

Then we must return to s. 30, and there it is made imperative on this court to dismiss the petition if satisfied that the petitioner has condoned the adultery complained of. Here is the crucial question: Does the claim for damages when condonation is proved fall with the petition, or does it survive? I have felt difficulty in giving an effect to condonation since the Act of Parliament which it never possessed before, having regard to the words of s. 33. The chief difficulty arises in the case of a petition limited to damages only when the dissolution of the marriage is not prayed and the adulterer sets up the condonation of the wife. If effect is given to s. 30 the court is compelled to dismiss the petition.

The strongest ground, in my judgment, for thinking that the claim for damages falls with the petition where condonation is proved is this. Under s. 30 the petition is to be dismissed in the following cases: (i) If the court is not satisfied that the alleged adultery has been committed; (ii) if the petitioner has during the marriage been accessory to or conniving at the adultery of the other party to the marriage; (iii) if he has condoned the adultery complained of; (iv) if the petition is presented in collusion with either of the respondents. In the first two cases a good defence to the old action of criminal conversation would have existed at common law, yet condonation is put on the same footing as these cases. This leads me to think the legislature intended to re-model the law in respect of condonation, and to make condonation a ground for dismissing a petition claiming damages if condonation was proved, just as if the alleged adultery had not been proved, or it had been proved that the petitioner had connived at the adultery of the other party to the marriage. I read the words at the end of s. 30 thus: "then and in any of the said cases the court shall dismiss the said petition," whether it contains a claim for damages or not, including in the category condonation.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that, on the true construction of the Act of Parliament, the claim for damages is ancillary to and dependent on the petition and falls with it. It is to be observed, too, that the damages when recovered are to be placed under the control of the court. The claim, too, for damages, if the petition is for damages only, must be made by petition, and it is, therefore, a petition within s. 30. It would be, too, somewhat inconsistent with the definition I have given of condonation implying an absolute and complete forgiveness of the offence complained of followed by cohabitation, to hold that the injured spouse was still entitled to be compensated in damages; it would be analogous to holding that a creditor could sue for a debt which he had released.

I will now deal with the authorities which seem to me to favour the construction which I have placed upon the Act of Parliament. The two directly in point are Pomero v. Pomero and Hadley (1), decided in 1884, and Story v. Story and O'Connor (11), decided in 1887, taking different views of the matter in controversy. But of those cases presently; I will first deal with earlier cases. Norris v. Norris, Lawson and Mason (12), decided in 1861, was a petition for dissolution

A of marriage when condonation was set up. There was no claim for damages, and the decision was on s. 34 of the Act in respect of costs. The Judge Ordinary said (4 Sw. & Tr. at p. 237):

“The petitioner, by condoning his wife’s adultery with Lawson, has waived all right to any proceedings against him in this court.”

B Seddon v. Seddon and Doyle (13) was before the court in 1860. It was a petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife’s adultery, claiming £3,000 damages against the co-respondent. The answer charged that the petitioner, by his wilful neglect and misconduct, had conduced to the adultery of the respondent, and counter-charged adultery. It was contended in argument that a co-respondent is precluded by the terms of s. 33 of the Act from pleading such matters in answer C to a petition in which the husband claims damages. In the course of the argument the Judge Ordinary asked the counsel this question (30 L.J.P.M. & A. at p. 13):

“Suppose a petitioner claims damages, and the adultery is clearly proved, but there is proof also of such misconduct on the part of the husband as would induce the court to refuse a divorce, would the petitioner be entitled to his damages?”

D The learned counsel said, “Yes.” Whereupon the Judge Ordinary said (ibid.):

“He certainly would not, if the court is to treat the claim for damages as an action for crim. con., for, the petition being dismissed, he would be in the position of a non-suited plaintiff.”

E This is strong to show the view the Judge Ordinary took of s. 33.

Ramsden v. Ramsden and Luck, Ramsden v. Ramsden (14), in 1886, were two suits which had been consolidated; the one was a suit to recover damages by the husband against Luck, not praying for a dissolution of the marriage; the other by the wife against the husband for dissolution of the marriage, on the ground of his adultery and cruelty. With regard to the adultery charged by the wife against F the husband, he set up condonation. The adultery by Luck with the wife was admitted. The jury found that Ramsden, the husband, had committed adultery, but that the adultery had been condoned by the wife, but that it had been revived by the cruelty of the husband subsequent to the condonation. They further found that Mrs. Ramsden and Luck had committed adultery, and they assessed damages against Luck and in favour of Ramsden at one farthing. The President dismissed G Mrs. Ramsden’s petition on account of her adultery, but gave her costs against her husband. In the suit of Ramsden v. Ramsden and Luck (14) he directed that each party should pay his own costs, and does not appear to have given judgment for one farthing

I now come to Pomero v. Pomero and Hadley (1) and Story v. Story and O’Connor (11). These cases are directly in point. The first was a husband’s H petition for dissolution and for damages against the co-respondent. The petitioner admitted in his evidence that he had condoned his wife’s adultery and taken her back to live with him. It was urged that condonation of adultery committed by a wife with a particular person was a bar to any proceedings in the court by the husband against that person. BUTT, J., thought s. 33 of the Act clear, and said a great hardship would be inflicted by depriving a husband who had pardoned his I wife of all remedy against the adulterer. He cites s. 33, and then says condonation was no bar to the action for criminal conversation, and, therefore, although condonation is proved and admitted, the case must go to the jury on the issue of connivance, and, if necessary, to assess the damages. The case does not appear to have been very elaborately argued, and the only authority cited was Norris v. Norris (12).

It was decided in 1884, and in 1887 Story v. Story (11) was heard by SIR JAMES HANNEN, P. It was a suit by the husband for dissolution of his marriage with the respondent, on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent, and claimed damages. The respondent in her answer pleaded condonation and counter-charged adultery, which the petitioner did not deny, but pleaded that the respondent had condoned the offence, and lived with him afterwards. The jury found that the respondent and co-respondent had committed adultery, and that the petitioner had not connived at nor condoned the adultery. They assessed the damages at £300. The petitioner admitted his own adultery with a maid-servant, which was condoned by the wife. The learned judge came to the conclusion that the petitioner, having shown himself regardless of the marital tie, was not entitled to come to the court and claim a release from the marriage bond, and dismissed the petition. Counsel for the petitioner inquired as to the damages. The President said (12 P.D. at p. 148):

“They go with my decision on the petition. As the petition is dismissed the petitioner is not entitled to damages.”

Pomero v. Pomero (1) was not cited.

These two cases are directly in point, and are in direct conflict with each other. I have to decide which is to be followed. Story v. Story (11) is decided in accordance with the construction which I place upon the Act of Parliament, and seems to me to be consonant with the authorities, and I am told it is in harmony with the practice of the court. I think the claim for damages falls within the petition. Story v. Story (11) ought, in my judgment, to be followed, and Pomero v. Pomero (1) overruled. The judgment of the President must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in a suit by a husband against his wife for divorce, wherein he charged her with having committed adultery with two co-respondents, Sampson and Turner, and he also claimed damages against Turner. The learned President dismissed the petition against Turner, or, to state it more accurately, dismissed him from the suit, upon the ground that it was established that the petitioner had condoned his wife's adultery with him, and he also adjudged that the petitioner should pay Turner's costs. As regards the case against the co-respondent Sampson, a decree nisi was granted, and no question arises on this appeal thereon. Counsel for the husband asserted that this judgment was erroneous, (i) because there was no evidence to constitute condonation by the petitioner of the adultery of his wife with Turner, and inasmuch as Turner's adultery had been proved he should not have been dismissed from the suit; and (ii) upon the ground that, as damages were claimed by the petitioner against Turner, who had been proved to have committed the adultery charged, the petitioner was entitled as of right to a verdict and judgment for at least nominal damages against him; and consequently the petitioner could not be ordered to pay his costs.

It was proved that the petitioner with full knowledge of his wife's adultery with Turner forgave it and resumed cohabitation with her, but it was argued that, inasmuch as when he did so he did not know of the adultery which had then taken place between his wife and the other co-respondent (Sampson), there could be no condonation of the adultery with Turner, for, to constitute condonation, the husband must forgive all the adulteries of his wife, whether known or not at the time. This raised a point which was new to me, but, as it has been raised, it must be examined. I first turn to the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which founded the present Divorce Court and its proceedings. Section 27 deals with the presentation of a petition for divorce by husband against wife or vice versa, in which damages are not claimed. Section 28 enacts that, unless excused, the husband in such petition shall make the alleged adulterer co-respondent. That means that the alleged adulterers are to be made co-respondents if there are more than one, and it appears to me that in such circumstances the case against each is separate and distinct. Section 29 enacts that the court upon such petition is to satisfy itself, as far as it reasonably can, whether the petitioner has connived at

A or condoned the adultery; that means the separate adulteries charged if more than one, and also to inquire into counter charges, if any; and s. 30 enacts among other things, that if the petitioner has connived at or condoned the adultery complained of, that is, the separate and distinct adulteries complained of in the petition, if more than one, the court shall dismiss the petition.

B But counsel for the husband says that, to constitute condonation, the whole of the adulteries actually committed by the wife must be condoned, whether known or not, or complained of or not in the petition; that condonation is the forgiveness of the wife of all her adulteries, and not the forgiveness of the co-respondents, and that, unless the husband knows of all the adulteries his wife has committed when he forgave a particular adultery and resumed cohabitation, it is not condonation at all, for in such circumstances he does not blot out all the offences of his wife, C which alone constitutes condonation. He also says that, unless the husband is informed of all the adulteries of his wife when he forgives a particular adultery, he is led to do so under circumstances which cause the forgiveness of the particular adultery not to be a forgiveness at all.

It seems to me that, as to this, the most which can be said is that he might not have forgiven the particular adultery if he had known of all; but I do not understand how it can be said that it is not any forgiveness at all. Test the correctness of these propositions in this way. Petition by a husband against a wife charging adultery with co-respondent A. Defence by A. that this adultery has been condoned by the petitioner. Did anyone ever hear of a reply by a petitioner by way of confession and avoidance to such a defence, "I admit that I have forgiven and condoned my wife's adultery with you, but when I did so I did not know that my wife had also committed adultery with X., Y., and Z., and, therefore, I have not condoned the adultery with you." Yet, if the argument addressed to us is correct, this would be a good reply. No such replication can be found in the books, although circumstances must, on very many occasions, have existed whereby a defence of condonation could have been got rid of if the proposition is sound. D Durant v. Durant (3), Turton v. Turton (4), and Bramwell v. Bramwell (5), E wherein somewhat equivocal language was used, were cited to support the point insisted upon, and also Dempster v. Dempster (2), where SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL pointed to the two constructions which could be placed upon the language so used, and where he left the point undecided. F

In my judgment, the law as to condonation was accurately and clearly stated by SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL in Keats v. Keats (8), where he described it (1 Sw. G & Tr. at p. 346) as

"a blotting out of the offence imputed so as to restore the offending party to the position which he or she occupied before the offence was committed"; and again in Peacock v. Peacock (7), where it is described as the forgiveness of a conjugal offence with the full knowledge of all the circumstances attending it. H There is no authority that to constitute condonation there must be a forgiveness of all conjugal offences whether known or not, and indeed, Alexandre v. Alexandre (6) is opposed to this contention. In this case the wife had been guilty of adultery with two different persons, one of which acts the petitioner had condoned and the other he had not, it not being then known to him. Yet the Judge Ordinary (LORD PENZANCE) held that the offence which was disclosed was condoned, although the other was not, and he granted a decree for divorce upon that adultery which the I petitioner had not condoned. His view of the condonation of the known offence is inconsistent with the contention of the husband on the point now taken. We are asked to say that LORD PENZANCE was wrong. I decline to do so, for I believe his view to be in consonance with the law as long since administered in this country as regards condonation, and, in my judgment, the first point raised is untenable.

As to the second point, viz., that where damages are claimed and adultery proved against a co-respondent, the petitioner is entitled as of right to a verdict and judgment for damages against that co-respondent in precisely the same way as if the suit were an old action for criminal conversation, and that, as condonation was no defence to such an action, so now in a petition by a husband if he claims damages against the co-respondent under s. 33 of the Act of 1857, and the sole defence is condonation, the petitioner is entitled to a verdict and judgment in his favour for damages as of right. The first remark I wish to make upon this is, if this be so, why did the legislature expressly abolish the old action of criminal conversation as it did by s. 59 and frame in its place the somewhat elaborate section, viz., s. 33, and which, beyond question, interfered with the petitioner obtaining the damages for himself as in the action for criminal conversation he would have done. Secondly, if this argument be correct (and as I now assume, only one co-respondent with whom the wife has committed adultery, so as to get clear of the first point), this strange result would follow, that whereas by s. 30 it is unquestionably enacted that if "the adultery complained of" has been connived at or condoned, or if the petition has been presented in collusion, the court shall dismiss the petition, yet, if the adultery has been condoned and the petitioner applies for and obtains damages against the co-respondent, the court shall not dismiss the petition.

I cannot find any indication of this in the statute, which enacts without qualification that, if the adultery complained of be connived at or condoned, the court shall dismiss the petition. It should be noticed that connivance was a defence to an action of crim. con., whereas condonation was not; yet by the Act the same consequences are now to follow from each, viz., the petition shall be dismissed. Section 33 now empowers a husband to make a claim for damages against a co-respondent either in a petition for dissolution of marriage or in a petition for judicial separation, or in a petition for damages only, and enacts that such a claim for damages shall be "heard and tried" upon the same principles, in the same manner, and subject to the same rules and regulations as actions of crim. con. formerly were; that is, by a jury, by examination and cross-examination of witnesses in open court, by admission of the same evidence, by a direction as to how damages were to be assessed, and with like speeches of counsel, but in addition thereto (and this is what also now differentiates a petition asking for damages from the old action of crim. con.), that all the enactments of the Act as to the hearing and "decision" of the petition so far as may be necessary shall apply. Among the enactments which it is necessary to apply when the court has to decide as to what is to be done with a petition proved after hearing and trial to be founded upon condoned adultery is s. 30, for that section enacts that such a petition shall be dismissed.

In my judgment, it is not correct to state that a petitioner is now in the same position as in the old crim. con. action days, for to get damages from an adulterer he is now compelled by statute to proceed by way of petition in the Divorce Court; he cannot as of right get the damages for himself, and the statute is express that, for connived at as well as for condoned adulteries the petition shall be dismissed. It will be seen that even where a petition is brought only to recover damages against an adulterer under s. 33 of the petition is to be served upon the wife unless such service is dispensed with by the court. This was not so in an action for crim. con. In my opinion, when a petition under s. 33 is dismissed, the claim for damages fails, together with all other claims therein, for when the petition is dismissed there is nothing whereon to hang a judgment for damages, as argued by the petitioner. In my judgment, the true construction of the statute is that the petitioner cannot recover damages from an adulterer when he has either connived at or condoned the adultery for which he asks for damages, nor when he has presented his petition in collusion. The legislature has now placed all matrimonial cases, whether damages are sought for therein or not, under the jurisdiction of the court to be dealt with as the statute prescribes.

So much for the statute. I now come to the cases. In the year 1861, in Norris v. Norris (12) the husband petitioned for a divorce upon the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondents. As to one co-respondent the adultery had been condoned, though revived by subsequent adultery. The Judge Ordinary, as regards

A the condoned adultery, held that the petitioner, by condoning his wife's adultery, had waived all right to any proceedings against the co-respondent in the court. The learned judge acted upon the provisions of s. 30, though it is true that in that case the petitioner did not ask for damages.

B In Seddon v. Seddon (15), in 1862, the husband petitioned under s. 33 for a divorce from his wife, claiming damages against the co-respondent. The jury found that the wife had committed adultery with the co-respondent, and that the petitioner had been guilty of conduct conducing to the adultery, and they assessed the damages at one farthing. The Judge Ordinary, acting pursuant to s. 31, dismissed the petition. In a proceeding in that case the Judge Ordinary said (30 L.J.P.M. & A. at p. 14):

C "It is reasonable that a co-respondent should have an opportunity of protecting himself by appealing to the discretion of the court, and asking the court, under the power conferred upon it by s. 31, under certain circumstances, to dismiss the petition. . . . If he can plead such matters in answer to a petition which does not claim damages, it would be a strange thing if a petitioner by making such a claim could preclude a co-respondent from raising a defence he might otherwise have made, by appealing to the discretion of the court. . . . The meaning of s. 33 is, that the question of damages is to be dealt with upon the same principle and in the same manner as in the common law courts, not that the record is to be framed in the same manner."

D In the year 1867, in Adams v. Adams and Colter (16), there was a petition by a husband against his wife for a divorce, claiming damages against a co-respondent; E the jury found that the petitioner had connived at and had also condoned his wife's adultery, and found damages one farthing. The Judge Ordinary dismissed the petition, applying to s. 33 the provisions of s. 30. In 1872 LORD PENZANCE decided Ravenscroft v. Ravenscroft and Smith (17). In this case the petitioner recovered the sum of £100 damages against the co-respondent, yet, upon the Queen's Proctor intervening and proving that the petitioner had been guilty of adultery, LORD F PENZANCE, applying the provisions of s. 31, dismissed the petition. In 1886 Ramsden v. Ramsden (14) was decided. This was a very rare case of a petition by a husband against a co-respondent claiming damages only. The adultery of the co-respondent was proved, and so was a counter-charge against the petitioner. The jury assessed the damages at one farthing. The President, SIR JAMES HANNEN, directed that each party should pay their own costs, and if the argument now G addressed to us be correct, he should have given judgment for the petitioner for one farthing, which apparently from the report he did not. In Story v. Story (11), in 1887, a petitioner established that his wife had committed adultery with the co-respondent, and the jury assessed the damages at £300; but they also found that the petitioner had committed adultery which had been condoned by the wife. The President dismissed the petition, and held that the petitioner was not entitled to H damages.

I It will be seen that, in all these cases excepting the first, the petitioner sought and recovered damages at the hands of the jury against the co-respondents, yet in each case the court, when deciding what was to be done with the petition, applied the provisions of ss. 30 or 31, and refused to allow the petitioners to reap the benefits of their verdicts, and not a single case has been produced in which a petitioner to whom the provisions of either s. 30 or s. 31 applied has recovered by judgment the damages assessed. It was, however, pointed out that BUTT, J., in the year 1884, in Pomero v. Pomero (1), had decided that condonation of the wife's adultery by a petitioner was no answer to his claim for damages against the co-respondent, and it certainly appears to me that such was the opinion of the learned judge when he decided that case. He held that under s. 33 the claim for damages was to be "heard and tried" on the same principles, in the same manner, and subject to the same or the like rules and regulations as actions of crim. con. were at the time of the passing of the Act; but his attention does not seem to have been directed to the further provisions of the section—viz., that when hearing and deciding a petition under s. 33 all the enactments of the statute, so far as might be necessary, should apply. That means, when deciding a petition under s. 33, in which the adultery has been condoned by the petitioner, the provisions of s. 30 shall apply; and when deciding a petition in which the petitioner has been guilty of any of the acts mentioned in s. 31, the provisions of the section shall apply.

I can find, neither in the statutes nor in the cases, any indication that, when deciding upon a petition in which damages are sought, and condonation only is set up, s. 30 shall not apply. The words are general and imperative, viz., that if the petition is founded upon condoned adultery it shall be dismissed. In my judgment, the judgment of BUTT, J., cannot be supported, but, when a petition under s. 33 is adjudicated upon, the provisions of either s. 30 or s. 31 apply, as the case may be, and the petitioner is not entitled as of right to a judgment for the damages awarded by the jury; and SIR FRANCIS JEUNE was correct when he dismissed Turner from this suit. For these reasons this appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I have read the judgments which have just been read by the lord justices, and I concur in them. I, however, wish to add some additional observations of my own.

A careful study of the various sections of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which bear upon the present appeal has convinced me that, when in 1857 the legislature dealt with the whole subject of divorce and adultery, Parliament not only abolished the old action of crim. con. (s. 59), but re-modelled the law applicable to claims for damages for adultery. My reasons are as follows: (i) Such claims are placed wholly under the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court; they can only be made by petition, and the damages recovered are placed under the control of the court (s. 33). (ii) The petition must be served on the wife, unless the court dispenses with such service (s. 33). (iii) The petition must be dismissed, if the petitioner has been accessory to or conniving at the adultery complained of, or has condoned the same (ss. 29, 30, 33). (iv) The claim for damages is, in my judgment, subject to all these overriding provisions. But, subject to them, the claim is to be as the old common law action for crim. con. (s. 33). The result is that, if a wife's adultery with a particular man has been condoned, no claim for damages against him is now maintainable. Under the present law such a conclusion is, in my opinion, highly reasonable, for to condone a particular act of adultery, and afterwards to make it the subject of a petition to which the wife is a party, to publish her condoned misconduct, and to expose her to shame and misery, is to pursue a course of conduct so utterly inconsistent with condonation that I cannot bring myself to believe that the legislature intended to allow it.

The view thus arrived at is, no doubt, inconsistent with Pomero v. Pomero (1), but it is impossible, I think, to reconcile that case with a long line of authorities on the construction of the Act. The general view which I take of the Act is supported by Seddon v. Seddon (13), Norris v. Norris (12), Lyne v. Lyne and Blackney (18), and Story v. Story (11), which is diametrically opposed to Pomero v. Pomero (1). The latter case was at one stage of the present case followed by SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, but he did not adhere to it when it became necessary to pronounce his final decision, and, in my opinion, he was right. Pomero v. Pomero (1) cannot, in my opinion, be supported, and ought to be distinctly overruled.

With respect to the question whether a husband can effectually condone his wife's adultery with one man, even although he is ignorant of her adultery with another, I have come to the conclusion that he can. I have carefully considered the older authorities, and Dempster v. Dempster (2), but, having regard to the language of s. 30 of the Act of 1857, viz., “has condoned the adultery complained of,”

A and having regard to the absurd consequences which would result from the opposite view, now that condonation is an answer to a claim for damages, I cannot judicially hold that a man cannot condone his wife's adultery with one man, although he may be ignorant of her offence with another. This was evidently the view taken by LORD PENZANCE in Alexandre v. Alexandre (6). It has been already decided that a subsequent offence by a wife will not enable her husband to obtain damages in respect of a previously condoned offence: Norris v. Norris (12); and that the condonation of one offence is no condonation of another which is unknown to the condoning party: Alexandre v. Alexandre (6). In my opinion, this appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Surrender—Grant of new lease—Need for change of possession at time of grant.

F The grant of a new lease in possession with merely the oral assent of a person in possession under a prior subsisting lease does not operate as a surrender in law of the prior lease. There is no surrender by operation of law unless the old tenant gives up possession to the new tenant at or about the time of the grant of the new lease to which he assents. The grant of a new lease to a stranger with the tenant's assent and change of possession preceding or following the lease are acts of notoriety giving rise to an estoppel in pais which a mere oral assent will not do.

H The proper plaintiff in an action of trespass to land is the person in possession at the time of the trespass. A mere right of property without possession is not sufficient to support the action.

Feb. 16, 1893. CHITTY, J., read the following judgment. This action relates to certain collieries at Mangotsfield in the county of Gloucester. The leases dealing with the property are derived from two adverse titles in the landlords as to part of the property demised, some being granted by Newman, who is a defendant, and others by Emmett's representatives, who are not parties to the action. The relief claimed by the plaintiff is of a peculiar and limited nature. He is not, and never has been, in possession of any part of the property. He does not seek to recover possession; he asks merely for declaration of his title, for injunctions, and for damages. E

The plaintiff's title is founded first, and mainly, on a lease executed by Newman, dated Aug. 8, 1887, and, secondly, on a lease granted by Emmett's representatives, dated Sept. 29, 1885. To establish his title under the Newman lease of 1887, the plaintiff seeks to get rid of a prior lease granted by Newman on Nov. 15, 1884. This lease of 1884 was granted by Newman to Powell and two others for a term of forty-five years from June 24, 1884. It comprised the upper series of coal in Mangotsfield, known as the Parkfield seam (but no other series), lying within a district of 700 acres. It included also certain surface rights, and was renewable for a further period of forty-five years. The lessees took possession under this lease, opened some pits and did some working; but their working had practically come to a standstill at or before the beginning of 1887. The means of the lessees were exhausted, and the rent was in arrear when the transactions in which the plaintiff took part were begun. The lease of Aug. 8, 1887, was granted by Newman to the plaintiff for a term of forty-two years from June 24, 1887. It comprised (a) the upper series, as in the lease of 1884, (b) the lower series under the same area, (c) the coal in an additional area, and (d) certain machinery and plant then on the property. The royalty reserved was fourpence a ton, being less by a halfpenny than the royalty under the lease of 1884; the dead rent was £30 a year; the surface rent £4 a year per acre used, and the rent for the machinery and plant was £5 a year. The lease contains a proviso for re-entry for non-payment of rent and for breach of the covenants to work, but there is no clause dispensing with the necessity for a legal demand for the rent. The plaintiff has not entered into possession under this lease, nor has he done any working thereunder according to the covenants. The term, then, is not vested in him, he has only an interesse termini. F

The other lease under which the plaintiff claims, namely, the lease of 1885, was granted to Powell and four others (being, as to two of them, the co-lessees G H I

A with Powell under the lease of 1884) by Emmett's representatives. It comprises all the coal under twenty-five acres of land known as Church Farm, part of the area of 700 acres mentioned in the Newman leases of 1884 and 1887. The Parkfield seam does not exist within the twenty-five acres, and, therefore, physically it is not included in this lease of 1885, but the lower seams included in the lease of 1887 are included in this lease. The lease is for a term of twenty-nine years from
B Sept. 29, 1885. Possession was taken under this lease by the lessees; the reason for the lessees taking this lease was, as is alleged by the plaintiff, and no doubt correctly, the existence of a dispute as to ownership between Newman and Emmett's representatives. This lease of 1885 was, under the circumstances hereafter stated, sold by the lessees to the plaintiff for £400, and assigned by them to him by deed dated Sept. 22, 1887. The other dealings with the lease of 1884 and the property
C comprised in the lease of 1885 will be more conveniently stated later on.

The plaintiff's right to the lease of Aug. 8, 1887, is impeached by the defendants Newman, Hands and Scott, on the ground of fraud. The fraud alleged and insisted on at the trial was (in substance) a false representation made by the plaintiff at an interview which took place in April, 1887, that he had purchased the lease of 1884 upon the faith of which, it is alleged, Newman granted the lease of D 1887. The case set up is one, not of innocent misrepresentation, but of fraudulent misrepresentation. [HIS LORDSHIP referred to the evidence.] I hold that the defendants have failed to prove that the representation was in fact made. They have also failed to prove that, if made, it induced Newman to grant the lease of 1887. The result is, that I find the issue of fraud against the defendants who have raised it.

E The next point raised by the defendant Newman against the lease of 1887 was, that it had been determined by re-entry in April, 1888, under the proviso for non-payment of rent; but it was admitted that no legal demand had been made for the rent, and this point was at once abandoned by Newman's counsel at the Bar.

The next question is one of law, whether the lease of 1884 has, as the plaintiff contends, been surrendered by operation of law. The lease itself was not delivered
F to the plaintiff, nor to the lessor Newman, or to his solicitors, upon the grant of the lease of 1887, which latter lease (as already appears) purported to be a lease in possession. The lease of 1884 had been lent by Mr. Nicholas, the lessees' solicitor, to the plaintiff in April, 1887, for perusal, and the plaintiff had returned it to him. It was not left in the possession of Newman or his solicitors, but apparently remained in the hands of Nicholas or his clients, the lessees. It was
G produced by the defendant Scott at the trial. Since it was returned to Nicholas it has never been in the plaintiff's possession. It has been dealt with adversely to him as if it were a subsisting lease as follows. It was assigned by the lessees Powell and others to the defendant Scott by indenture, dated Feb. 13, 1888; and it was assigned by Scott to the defendant company by indenture dated May 30, 1888. It has, since the issuing of the writ, been re-assigned by the defendant company
H to Scott, in whom it is now vested, if subsisting. These three assignments were produced in court. The lease of 1887, which includes all the property comprised in the 1884 lease, was granted with the consent of the lessees of 1884. Such consent was given, but orally only, by Nicholas, acting on their behalf and with their authority, on the occasion of the delivery of the lease of 1887 to the plaintiff on Sept. 27, 1887. But the plaintiff (as already stated) has never been in possession
I of the property demised by the lease of 1887. Consequently, as between the lessees of 1884 and those claiming under them, on the one hand, and the plaintiff, on the other, there has been no change of possession.

In these circumstances, it is contended for the plaintiff, as a proposition of law, that the grant of a new lease in possession with the oral assent merely of a person in possession under a prior subsisting lease operates as a surrender in law of the prior lease, and, consequently, that such grant and mere oral assent are sufficient to take the case out of the operation of s. 3 of the Statute of Frauds, which enacts that no lease shall be surrendered unless by deed or note in writing, or by act and operation of law [see now Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 53 (1) (a)]. Section 3 of the Real Property Act, 1845 [see now Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 52], avoids a surrender in writing unless made by deed, except in cases where the lease itself might have been created without a deed. The lease of 1884 required a deed for its creation. All the authorities bearing on the question of surrender by operation of law were cited and commented on at the Bar. The question again raises the controversy which subsisted at one time between the Courts of King's Bench and the Exchequer, illustrated by Thomas v. Cook (1), and Lyon v. Reed (2), and discussed at length in 2 SMITH'S LEADING CASES (8th Edn.), p. 884 et seq. But it appears to me that this controversy was, so far as concerns the question before me, set at rest by the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Davison v. Gent (3). In Thomas v. Cook (1) there was in fact a change of possession, the old tenant Cook having gone out of possession when the plaintiff accepted Perkes as his tenant: see the observations of LORD ST. LEONARDS in Creagh v. Blood (4), 3 Jo. & Lat. at p. 160. In his judgment in Davison v. Gent (3), POLLOCK, C.B., states the law thus (1 H. & N. at p. 749):

"It must, therefore, be taken to be established that where a lessee assents to a lease being granted to another, and gives up his own possession to the new lessee, that is a surrender by operation of law."

This statement appears to me not to be qualified by any subsequent expressions in the same judgment. It substantially reconciles Thomas v. Cook (1) with the principles enunciated by PARKE, B., in Lyon v. Reed (2), so far as relates to leases in possession.

It is not, perhaps, of any great practical importance in which of the two following ways the proposition of law is stated, viz.: (i) There is no surrender by operation of law unless the old tenant gives up possession to the new tenant at or about the time of the grant of the new lease to which he assents; or (ii) the change of possession is a necessary part of the consent. I prefer, however, the first, as being the more correct form. To hold that mere oral assent to the new lease operates as a surrender in law would be a most dangerous doctrine; it would practically amount to a repeal of the Statute of Frauds, and let in all the mischief against which the statute was intended to guard. The policy of that statute was carried still further by the Real Property Act, 1845, which required a deed in cases where formerly a mere writing would have sufficed. The foundation of the doctrine that the acceptance of a new lease by an existing tenant operates as a surrender in law is estoppel by act in pais, the law attributing the force of estoppel to certain acts of notoriety, such as livery of seisin, entry, acceptance of an estate, and the like; and the grant of a new lease to a stranger with the tenant's assent and change of possession preceding or following the lease, bring such a case within the scope of the same doctrine, which mere oral assent would not do: see SHELFORD'S REAL PROPERTY STATUTES (9th Edn.), p. 259. The plaintiff's counsel relied on a dictum of STIRLING, J., in Baring v. Abingdon (5), [1892] 2 Ch. at p. 381, that the granting of a new lease to a stranger with the assent of the lessee operates as a surrender of the old lease. But on the facts of the case it appears that there was a change of possession; the learned judge himself refers to Davison v. Gent (3), and I have his authority for stating that he did not intend to express any opinion on the point whether a change of possession was necessary. For the reasons stated I am of opinion that the lease of 1884 was not surrendered by operation of law.

[HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with certain questions of fact and a question of law which no longer calls for report owing to the abolition of the doctrine of interesse termini by s. 149 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and continued:] The plaintiff claims damages against the defendant Hands in respect of his working of the coal. The plaintiff's allegation against Hands is that he has worked coal comprised in the lease of 1887 without specifying from what part of the property the coal has been worked. Hands, by his silence in his defence, admits this paragraph. The working may, therefore, have been of coal comprised in the

- A 1884 lease, or in the 1885 lease, or in that part of the property comprised in the lease of 1887 which was not comprised in either of those leases. As regards coal in the 1884 lease the plaintiff cannot sue, inasmuch as that lease which has priority over the 1887 lease has never been vested in him. As regards coal within the 1885 area, the plaintiff cannot sue and does not sue Hands on his title to that lease. As regards any coal worked by Hands not within the area of either
- B of the 1884 or 1885 leases, the plaintiff as against Hands relies on his title under the 1887 lease. Having but an interesse termini he cannot maintain an action of trespass against Hands. His proper course as against Hands was to bring an action to recover possession, in which case Newman would have had an opportunity of coming in to defend, and the plaintiff would then have had to face the difficulties in his way arising from his 1887 lease being forfeitable.
- C It is settled law that a person having an interesse termini cannot bring an action of trespass: see Harrison v. Blackburn (6); and Turner v. Cameron's Coalbrook Steam Coal Co. (7); and WOODFALL'S LANDLORD AND TENANT (13th Edn.), p. 197. This is in substance an action of trespass. The plaintiff's counsel, however, cited the decision of the Court of Appeal in Gillard v. Cheshire Lines Committee (8). The court there held that a person having a mere interesse termini could maintain
- D an action for injury to his right. The cases on trespass though not cited, were, of course, present to the minds of the members of the court, who so held; there was no intention to overrule them, either directly or indirectly. The circumstances, shortly stated, were, that the plaintiff had agreed to take a theatre for eight weeks to commence on a future day. Before his right of entry accrued, the defendants, who were strangers, by excavations on their own property deprived
- E the theatre of the support of the adjacent land, so that the theatre was rendered unsafe, and was closed during the eight weeks by the proper authorities. The judgment turned on the proposition that the defendants had injured the plaintiff's proprietary right. While accepting that decision, as I am bound to do without question, I think that it does not apply to the facts of this case, which I need not repeat. The plaintiff has refrained, and, as I think, deliberately refrained
- F from exercising his right of entry under his voidable lease of 1887. I think he is not entitled to any damages; if I thought otherwise I should assess them at a mere nominal sum.

The reasons upon which I refuse to give the plaintiff damages are sufficient, and more than sufficient, to justify my refusing to grant an injunction. The right order will be to give the plaintiff declarations on the two points on which he

G succeeds, and to dismiss the rest of the action. The declarations will be as follows: Declare (i) that the lease of Aug. 8, 1887, was not obtained by fraud on the part of the plaintiff, and (ii) that the same was not duly determined in April, 1888, by re-entry by the defendant Newman by virtue of the condition for re-entry contained in the lease. If the plaintiff asks that judgment shall be without prejudice to any action he may bring to recover possession, and for mesne profits,

H or against Newman for not putting him into possession, then, if such exception is in the judgment, there must be a declaration in effect as follows: (i) That the lease of 1884 was not surrendered by operation of law or otherwise, and (ii) that the plaintiff has no title in law or in equity to that lease. In regard to the costs, the plaintiff would certainly be entitled to the costs of the issues in the action on which he succeeds, and would have to pay the costs of the issues on which he

I fails. That would be the strict order, but I think that there would be much difficulty in the taxing master's office in dividing the costs, and that the right order as to costs is to give no costs except that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the defendant company, against whom he has altogether failed.

TEMPERTON v. RUSSELL AND OTHERS

[Reported [1893] 1 Q.B. 715; 62 L.J.Q.B. 412; 69 L.T. 78; 57 J.P. 676; 41 W.R. 565; 9 T.L.R. 393; 37 Sol. Jo. 423; 4 R. 376]

Tort—Contract—Inducement to break—Inducement not to enter into—Malice—Intention to harm other party to contract—Advantage to person inducing—Damage—Competency of action.

Conspiracy—Contract—Inducement to break—Inducement not to enter into—Malice—Damage—Competency of action.

To induce a person who has entered into a contract with another to break that contract in order to harm the other party to the contract or to procure some advantage for the person putting forward the inducement is a malicious act which, if the other party to the contract suffers damage as the result of the breach, is actionable at his suit.

Per LORD ESHER, M.R.: I can see no difference between the case where a person induces another to break a contract and the case where he induces another not to enter into a contract.

An agreement by several persons to induce the breach of a contract, or to induce a person not to enter into a contract with a specified person, which agreement is malicious for the reasons mentioned above, is an actionable conspiracy on proof of damage.

C LORD ESHER, M.R.—I propose to state what I understand to be the facts of this case according to the evidence given at the trial, and how, upon those facts, the dispute arose, and then my view of the law applicable to those facts.

D The first event was the formation of three trade unions at Hull in connection with the building trade. Those unions are formed by an agreement among certain persons to become members of the unions upon certain terms, that is to say, the members agree together to form a union and to subscribe moneys in order that they may eventually receive certain benefits. They all agree to subject themselves to certain liabilities. Those liabilities were imposed in this case, and the members agreed that they would forfeit all benefits if they did not comply with the terms to which they had agreed. The main condition is that each of them shall, when called upon to act in a particular way by a person authorised by the union, so act, or be fined or expelled from the union, or both. Such a condition is E the foundation of all trade unionism, I believe; it was proved to be so in the case of these three trade unions. Each member has to this extent given up his individual liberty, and if he does not obey he loses the benefits for which he has paid. The unions made rules that certain conditions were always to be observed by builders in Hull, and that if any person did not comply with those conditions the unions would act upon their own members in such a way as to compel compliance.

F They, therefore, agreed to combine upon that point. The three unions formed a joint committee, which was to be the authority to determine what the individual members of the unions were to do. The joint committee was to act, and the agreement was that it should act, for each of the unions and for every member of each union. That joint committee was elected by all the members of the three unions to act as their authorised representative. The members gave to the joint committee G power to delegate their authority to persons appointed by the committee. The evidence shows that the joint committee delegated their authority to act in particular cases to the defendant Russell. Russell, therefore, became the delegate of each of the unions and of the joint committee, and, in a certain sense, the delegate of each member of the unions. He was the person authorised to direct the workmen to do or not do particular things. The three unions agreed to certain H rules, among them being r. 9, which has given rise to this dispute. They had a right to do that and to insist upon compliance with the rules by the members of their own bodies, but those rules could not be binding upon any person who did not belong to the unions.

I That being the state of things, the firm of Myers and Temperton began to exercise their right to carry on their business in Hull in a manner not in accordance with r. 9, as they had a perfect right to do. The three unions and the joint committee objected to this, and resolved to coerce the firm of Myers and Temperton to carry on their business, not in the way in which the firm wished, but in accordance with the rules laid down by the unions. The unions and the joint committee attempted to carry out this resolution, but failed. Myers and Temperton had never agreed to these rules, and refused to be bound by them. The unions then thought that they could coerce Myers and Temperton in another way—by persuading other people not to deal with Myers and Temperton. Among other people, they tried thus to persuade the plaintiff Joseph Temperton, but he was a brother of a partner in Myers and Temperton, and said that he would not be so coerced, that he had never agreed to r. 9, and that he insisted on carrying on his business in his own way, and in dealing with Myers and Temperton as much as he pleased. It then became necessary for the unions to act with regard to Joseph Temperton and other persons in a similar position. They were unable to coerce Joseph Temperton not to deal with Myers and Temperton by direct means because he refused to cease dealing with Myers and Temperton, and they, therefore, endeavoured to overcome his resistance in another way. They said that, if any other person in the building trade dealt with Joseph Temperton, their members would refuse to work for those people. It is true that those people might or might not break their contracts with Joseph Temperton, but in business fact and truth it must necessarily follow from such a course that the business of Joseph Temperton would come to an end. That would be very strong coercion.

Then the unions, knowing that Joseph Temperton refused to do as they wished, and continued and would continue to deal with Myers and Temperton, began to act upon the persons who dealt with Joseph Temperton, among others upon Brentano and upon Gibson who had dealings with Joseph Temperton. Their intention was to force Joseph Temperton not to do that which by law he had a right to do. The joint committee delegated to the defendant Russell the authority to carry out this intention and to interfere with Joseph Temperton in the way in which he was interfered with. It is clear to me that Russell and the joint committee knew of the contracts which Brentano, Gibson, and others had made with Joseph Temperton, and also that Brentano would enter into other contracts with him. Russell, knowing these facts, informed Brentano that, if he went on dealing with Joseph Temperton, harm would come to him in his business because no workmen who were members of these unions in Hull would touch the goods supplied by Joseph Temperton, but would leave his, Brentano's, work.

Russell's action led to both of these results. The words spoken by Russell and the resolution passed by the joint committee were said and passed for the purpose of preventing Brentano from carrying out his contract with Joseph Temperton and of forcing Joseph Temperton to comply with the union rules, and for that purpose notice was given through Russell to the workmen in the employ of Brentano to leave work. It has been argued that this was only advice to the workmen or notice to them that they could do as they liked in the matter. That is not, in my opinion, the true view; the men were in reality bound to obey such orders. Russell knew this, and he had authority to order them to obey; the consequences of disobedience would be a fine or expulsion from the union. What Russell said, therefore, was in truth an order to the men which the men, being members of the unions, had agreed to obey. The delegate of the unions, therefore, did order or induce the members of the unions, i.e., the workmen, to cease to work for Brentano if he took any goods from Joseph Temperton, whether he had a contract with Joseph Temperton or not. By those means they did not induce or order Joseph Temperton to obey the wishes of the unions, but they acted so as to force him to obey or else be ruined in his business. They did what they did with that intent. It seems to me that there was clearly evidence against all the defendants as to that. They were all members of the joint committee of the three unions, and the matter was called to the attention of each of them. There was, I think, ample evidence against all of them that they were parties to and authorised all that which was done, with the intent which I have explained. The story is the same with regard to Gibson, only that their actions go a step further. They tell Gibson that he can get his goods from one Goode, and advise him to go to that person, and guarantee his transactions with him. This was not done to injure Gibson, but with the purpose and intent of injuring Joseph Temperton in order to force him to obey the behests of the unions, which they had no right to impose upon him.

The main purpose of the arguments used on behalf of the defendants has been to alter the effect of the facts, but those arguments have all failed. The facts are as I have stated them. What, then, is the law? As to the argument that the

A rule of law is confined to the case of master and servant, Bowen v. Hall (1) has done away with any such distinction. In Lumley v. Gye (2) the proposition of law was not confined to cases of master and servant, the opinion of the two judges being against the opinion of the other judge. These different judgments were before the Court of Appeal in Bowen v. Hall (1), and the Court of Appeal had to say with which of those judgments they agreed, and they agreed with the judgment of the majority, giving their reasons for doing so in a considered judgment. We tried in Bowen v. Hall (1) to state the rule as a general rule of law and to apply it to that particular case. In our judgment we said (6 Q.B.D. at pp. 338, 339):

C "The first is that the act of the defendants which is complained of must be an act wrongful in law and in fact. Merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact as in the second case put by COLERIDGE, J., in Lumley v. Gye (2) (2 E. & B. at p. 247); but if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff it is a malicious act which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act if injury ensues from it. We think that it cannot be doubted that a D malicious act, such as is above described, is a wrongful act in law and in fact. The act complained of in such a case as Lumley v. Gye (2), and which is complained of in the present case, is therefore, because malicious, wrongful. That act is a persuasion by the defendant of a third person to break a contract existing between such third person and the plaintiff. It cannot be maintained E that it is not a natural and probable consequence of that act of persuasion that the third person will break his contract. It is not only the natural and probable consequence, but by the terms of the proposition which involves the success of the persuasion, it is the actual consequence."

That statement of the law is directly in point in the present case, and exactly describes what was done in the cases of Brentano and Gibson. It could not possibly be made more applicable to this case than it is. I am not aware that that judgment in Bowen v. Hall (1) has ever been criticised. It is, therefore, binding upon us now, and applies exactly to this case, in which certain persons were forced to break their contracts with the plaintiff. Is there any real difference when a person, with the same intent and doing the same acts, seeks to force persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff? I can see no difference. There is the G same intent which is wrongful because it is malicious, and the acts have the same effect of injuring the plaintiff; the only difference is that in the one case the contracts have been made, while in the other case they have not been actually made. Suppose that I know that a man has made a contract with A.B., and that he will make another contract with him to-morrow, and that I tell him that, if he does not break his existing contract with A.B., I will injure him, and also that, if he H makes any other contract with A.B., I will do the same. It is argued that the law is different in the two cases. In my opinion, there is no difference. Is there any authority for saying that there is a difference? None has been suggested. It seems to me that Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick (3) is an authority the other way for saying that where people combine together to do injury to a particular person their conduct is unlawful and actionable.

I The opinions in the House of Lords in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (4), which was decided ten years after Bowen v. Hall (1), seem to show the difference between the two cases of an indictment and an action for conspiracy; in the former case proof of the conspiracy proves the indictment, whereas in an action the plaintiff must prove the conspiracy and damage resulting therefrom, otherwise there is no cause of action. In the present case, therefore, it would not be enough if it were only found that there was an agreement to injure and that it was unlawful, but it must be found that it caused damage. If the two things are made out, the unlawful agreement and the damages caused thereby, the opinion of LORD BRAMWELL in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (4) shows that there is an actionable wrong. He says (ante p. 272):

"The plaintiffs also say that these things, or some of them, if done by an individual, would be actionable. This need not be determined directly, because all the things complained of have their origin in what the plaintiffs say is unlawfulness, a conspiracy to injure; so that, if actionable when done by one, much more are they when done by several, and if not actionable when done by several, certainly they are not when done by one. It has been objected by capable persons that it is strange that that should be unlawful if done by several which is not if done by one, and that the thing is wrong if done by one, if wrong when done by several; if not wrong when done by one it cannot be when done by several. I think there is an obvious answer, indeed two: one is, that a man may encounter the acts of a single person, yet not be fairly matched against several. The other is, that the act when done by an individual is wrong though not punishable, because the law avoids the multiplicity of crimes de minimis non curat lex; while if done by several it is sufficiently important to be treated as a crime. Let it be, then, that it is no answer to the plaintiff's complaint that if what they complain of had been done by an individual there would be no cause of action. There is the further question whether there is a cause of action, the acts being done by several."

That recognises that, if there is an agreement to do a wrongful act, which is called a conspiracy, and that results in injuring some person, if it would not be a wrong if done by a single person, yet an agreement to do it makes it a wrong, as in Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick (3). The agreement in this case, therefore, made it a wrongful act as to the interference both with existing and with future contracts. I cannot feel any doubt that there is evidence that people were prevented from making contracts with the plaintiff by reason of the resolution which was passed. The direct evidence indeed is slight, but the plaintiff's business fell off from £60 to £15 a month. It is said that there might be other causes for that, but what is the natural inference to draw from the facts? The proper inference is that the action of the defendants was the cause. There was, therefore, evidence upon both claims upon which the jury might find for the plaintiff. There was no misdirection, and I think that the verdict was the only one which could be found consistently with good sense and truth. This appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I do not propose to go into the evidence or facts in this case which have been so fully dealt with by the Master of the Rolls. The case which is all important to the decision of this case is Bowen v. Hall (1). As I understand that case, the broad principle is laid down that a person who induces a party to a contract to break it, intending thereby to injure another person or to benefit himself, commits an actionable wrong. That is the effect of that case, and the decision has never been doubted since it was given. I take it that the principle is that a contract gives certain rights, that it not only binds the parties by an obligation, but also imposes upon all persons a duty to respect the contract made between the parties.

That being the law, what were the questions left to the jury in the present case? The first question was: "Did the defendants, or any of them, maliciously induce the persons named, or any of them, to break their contracts with the plaintiff"? If the law is as I have stated it to be, there was abundant evidence of everything implied in that question, and the jury answered it in the only way in which they could properly answer it. It has been said that the action of the men was spontaneous, and that they acted within their rights. That suggestion cannot be maintained for a moment. Neither the merchants nor the men acted of their own free will. The defendant Russell was the delegate of the three unions to represent them, and he acted upon instructions received from the joint committee. Then there is the second question left to the jury, as to inducing persons not to enter

- A into contracts with the plaintiff. That question was: "Did the defendants, or any two or more of them, maliciously conspire to induce the persons named and others not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff, and were such persons thereby induced not to make such contracts?" The jury found, not only that there was a combination, but also that the plaintiff suffered damage, which was essential to give him a cause of action.
- B Then arises the question whether there was any actionable wrong. I think that there clearly was. The result of all the cases is to show that a combination by two or more persons to induce others not to deal with a particular person or to enter into contracts with a particular person, if done with an intention to injure that person and if it results in damage to that person, is an actionable wrong. That appears from Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick (3) and from the opinions
- C in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (4). It has been argued that there was no evidence that any persons were induced not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff. The evidence is indeed not so strong upon this question as upon the first question, but I think that there was sufficient evidence; the falling off in the business of the plaintiff was evidence for the jury on that question. The finding, therefore, of the jury upon both questions was not
- D wrong, and their verdicts ought to stand; the direction of the learned judge as to the law was right. The appeal fails and must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiff in this case is a master mason and builder at Hull, who in the course of his business supplies building materials by contract to other persons. He sues the defendants, who are members of a joint committee of the Operative Bricklayers' of the Operative Plasterers' and of the Operative Labourers' Societies in that town (i) for having unlawfully and maliciously procured certain persons to break their contracts with him; and (ii) for having maliciously conspired to induce certain persons not to enter into contracts with him, by reason of which acts he was damaged. The jury have found against the defendants upon each of those alleged causes of action, and have awarded £50 damages upon the first and £200 damages upon the second. A motion has been made to us to set aside the verdict, and to enter it for the defendants, upon the ground that there was no evidence to fix any of the defendants with liability for the acts complained of, and that the learned judge at the trial misdirected the jury in point of law.

The question he left to the jury as to the first alleged cause of action was whether the defendants or any of them maliciously induced the persons named to break their contracts with the plaintiff, and he fully explained what was the meaning of the word "maliciously" in this question. He said:

G

"In my judgment, it is perfectly clear law that to induce a person who has made a contract with another to break that contract in order to hurt the person with whom it has been made, to hamper him in his trade, or to put undue pressure upon him, or to procure some indirect advantage for the person himself—to induce another to break a contract for any of those motives—is in point of law to do it maliciously. Therefore, if in this particular case you are of opinion that the plaintiff has satisfied you that any one of the defendants had induced—I will take one particular instance—Brentano, because he comes first, to break his contract with the plaintiff, of the existence of which he was aware, in order to hurt the plaintiff in his trade . . . and, if his object in doing that was, by hurting him in his trade, to compel him to do something which he did not want to do, . . . that would be 'maliciously' in point of law, and a cause of action would be established."

I

Nothing could be clearer than this direction, and that it is correct in point of law will be seen upon examining the opinion delivered by CROMPTON, WIGHTMAN, and ERLE, JJ., in Lumley v. Gye (2), and the judgment of this court (LORD SELBORNE, L.C., and BRETT, L.J., LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., dissenting) in Bowen v. Hall (1). It is not necessary, in my opinion, in this case to decide the point whether this cause of action will apply, if there is no contract in existence, and I reserve that point for decision hereafter. A

It was argued for the defendants that there was no evidence that the defendants (who were all members of the joint committee of the three societies, which Russell admitted that he represented) had, with knowledge of the existence of any contract, and with the intention of injuring the plaintiff and of crippling him in his trade, induced Brentano to break a contract with him, and it was said that all that the defendants had done was what was done in every strike, i.e., call out the men, and that this was legal. If this had been all, I should have agreed, for it cannot be doubted that, at any rate since the passing of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, if not from 1871 [when the Trade Union Act was passed], strikes per se, subject to the exceptions mentioned in ss. 4 and 5 of the Act of 1875, are legal. It was argued that, if the defendants were to be held liable in damages in this case, no trade union could hereafter call out their men, for it might be held that by so doing they were inducing the breach of a contract to the injury of one of the contracting parties, if there happened to be one. I do not agree that a strike is analogous to the present case; for, to maintain the cause of action sued on, there must be evidence that the defendant, with knowledge of the existence of a contract, had induced and succeeded in inducing one of the contracting parties to break his contract to the injury of the other contracting party, and there must also be evidence that the intention of the inducer was by such breach to do harm to the other contracting party, or, to use LORD HANNEN's words in Mogul Steamship Co. v. Macgregor, Gow & Co. (4), that the "real object was to injure the individual." The present is a very different case from that suggested, viz., the mere calling out of men on strike, though it does appear to me that, if a strike were used for the purpose and with the intent above mentioned, an action would lie. B C D E

In my judgment, there is evidence in this case, (i) that the defendants intended to coerce the builders, Myers and Temperton, to obey their edicts, and, to bring this about, they determined to cut off from them the supply of all materials they might require for their trade, and also the supply of men: (ii) that, inasmuch as the plaintiff would not fall in with their commands the defendants then determined to cripple and injure him in his trade by inducing Brentano (together with others who were under contract with the plaintiff) to break the contract which they well knew he had with the plaintiff, so that by those means he might be coerced into obedience; it will be remembered that the defendants Russell and Stephenson, in their answer to interrogatories stated that the plaintiff had broken no rules: (iii) that the defendants did induce Brentano to break his contract to the loss and injury of the plaintiff. It was, however, insisted that there was no evidence that the defendants knew that Brentano was under contract with the plaintiff; but I do not think that this can be maintained, having regard to the facts that, at the meeting of the joint committee on or about Sept. 11, 1892, the defendant Russell introduced Brentano to the meeting as having a contract with the plaintiff, that the minutes of the meeting of Sept. 19 state that Brentano attended to give evidence with regard to a contract made between himself and the plaintiff, and that the defendant Russell in his letter to Goode stated that Brentano had signed a contract with a firm who were in a dispute with the building trade, i.e., the plaintiff, and gave the Bricklayers' Society's guarantee to Goode, who was the person they had found to supply materials to Brentano in the place of the plaintiff under his contract with him, Brentano having been induced, or rather forced, to break his contract with the plaintiff. As before pointed out, there was ample evidence that Russell was deputed by the defendants to carry out, if he could, their common intent. In my judgment, not only was there good evidence against the defendants upon this case of Brentano, but I go further, and say that, if the jury had found for the defendants upon this, they would have been wrong. F G H I

I do not propose to discuss the evidence at length as to the other contractors, who, the jury have found, had been induced to break their contracts with the plaintiff by the action of the defendants. I will only call attention to the evidence

A of Gibson, whose contract with the plaintiff, it will be noticed, was produced at the meeting of Sept. 19 at which all the defendants were present. He stated that, at the interview which he had with Russell, the latter said that they meant to bring Temperton to his knees before they had done with him, and he would do no good till he had made his peace with them. This expression was very significant as to what the real intentions of the defendants were towards the plaintiff. Upon the first cause of action, in my judgment, it is impossible to hold that there was not evidence to support the verdict of the jury. As regards the second cause of action, i.e., the count for conspiracy, I agree with what has been said by the other members of the court. I think that the direction of the learned judge on that head was correct as being in accordance with what was said in Bowen v. Hall (1) and Mogul Steamship Co. v. Macgregor, Gow & Co. (4), and that there was evidence to support the verdict of the jury.

By s. 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875: "Every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be . . . kept so as not to be a nuisance . . ." Owing to a large increase in the number of buildings in the district of the defendant local authority which drained into a sewer constructed and maintained by the authority in the exercise of their statutory duties and unusually heavy rainfall the sewer overflowed and the premises of the plaintiffs became flooded with storm water and sewage, which caused damage.

Held: in the absence of proof of negligence or want of care by the authority in either the construction or the maintenance of the sewer or the provision of sewerage, the authority was not liable to the plaintiffs for a nuisance under s. 19.

Notes. Section 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was repealed by the Public Health Act, 1936, Sched. 3, Part I, being replaced by s. 31 of that Act which provides that: "A local authority shall so discharge their functions [relating to sewerage] as not to create a nuisance."

Action by the plaintiffs, Stretton's Derby Brewery, Ltd., for an injunction restraining the defendants, Derby Corporation, from allowing water, sewage, or noxious matter to be discharged or flow from their sewers on to the plaintiffs' land or premises, or from continuing the said sewers so as to cause a nuisance to the plaintiffs.

By s. 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875;

"Every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be constructed, covered, ventilated, and kept so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and to be properly cleansed and emptied."

Nov. 23, 1893. ROMER, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiffs' claim arises under the following circumstances. Many years ago, in exercise of their statutory duties, the defendants provided a system of drainage for the district, and, as part of that system, made the sewer that passes under the road in which the plaintiffs' brewery is situated. The brewery was erected some years after the sewer was made, part of it having been built in 1869, and other parts in 1876, 1880, and 1881. As the different parts of the brewery were erected, the owners for the time being exercised their statutory right and drained them into the sewer by communications which had to be and were first approved of by the defendants. These communications respectively run to the sewer from the floors of the cellars of several parts of the brewery, which floors are slightly above the crown of the sewer, so that the cellars cannot be flooded from the sewer until the sewer gets filled and a pressure is caused in it which forces the contents of the sewer up the communications through the floors of the cellars. On June 25, 1891, a heavy storm occurred, which blocked the sewer and drove the sewage up the plaintiff's

A communications to the cellars and flooded the cellars for a short time for a depth of about three feet, and, after the flood retired, left some two inches or so of sewage matter on the floors of the cellars. This undoubtedly caused damage to the plaintiffs, and they complained to the defendants. On May 25, 1892, another but slighter flooding occurred, and on June 28, 1892, there was another heavy storm and a flooding to the extent of about fourteen inches, which left a deposit
B of sewage, whereupon the plaintiffs made further complaint of the damage which they had sustained. The defendants not admitting liability, this action is brought in August, 1892, for an injunction and damages. After the action was commenced there was another flooding on the occasion of a heavy storm, which took place on July 11, 1893.

In considering the liability of the defendants for these floodings and consequent
C damage, it appears to me material to decide some questions of fact. In the first place, I find that the defendants, in making their existing system of drainage and in constructing the sewer, exercised due care, and were not guilty of any negligence, that system, as constructed, reasonably providing for the district, and for the then probable increase of buildings which would have to drain into it. In the next place, I find that when the communications between the brewery and the
D sewer were made, and for some years afterwards, the sewer was well constructed and sufficient for the purposes of draining the district, and could cause no flooding, or probability of flooding, to the brewery. I also find that the floodings arose, not from any want of repair in the defendants' sewer, but from the following circumstances. I think that owing to the large increase in the last few years in the number of buildings and places in the district which drain into the sewer in
E question, if a very heavy fall of rain occurs in a short space of time, the existing sewer has become insufficient in size to carry off the sudden influx of water, and gets choked, and so drives the contents of the sewer up the plaintiffs' communications, and into the floors of their cellars. It seems to me that such floodings arising from heavy falls of rain are likely, as matters now stand, to occur about once a year, and more frequently in the future, as the number of drains increases
F with the further buildings which may be erected in the district drained. I further find that, if (as the plaintiffs insist) the floors of their cellars are to remain as low as at present, and their communications are to continue to run from those floors, then the only way to prevent the liability to flooding is by the defendants constructing a new sewer or a new system of drainage for the district.

Assuming, then, that it has become the duty of the defendants as the sanitary
G authority to consider the question of constructing, and in due course to construct, a new sewer or a new drainage system, I have to consider whether the defendants, when this action was commenced, or up to the date of the trial of this action, were guilty of negligence or (as it is sometimes expressed) of want of reasonable care and diligence in maintaining the existing sewer and in not providing the new sewer or new system of drainage. As to this, I find that the defendants were
H not guilty of negligence or of want of reasonable care or diligence. In the first place, it is clear that the defendants, so long as the present sewer existed, and until its insufficiency, owing to the increase of buildings, rendered it necessary to construct a new sewer or new drainage system, were not guilty of negligence in maintaining the present sewer, or because, until the new sewer was made, the owners of the new buildings as they were erected exercised their statutory rights to
I drain into the existing sewer, so that the question of negligence resolves itself into this, whether the defendants were guilty of negligence in not providing a new sewer or new sewer system; and, as to this, I come to the conclusion that there was no negligence for the following reasons: As observed by BRAMWELL, B., in Ruck v. Williams (1) negligence is a relative term, and must mean negligence with reference to circumstances of time, place, or person.

The negligence, if any, of the defendants in the present action is not in omitting to do repairs or small works of that kind, which could be speedily done, but in not constructing a new sewer or sewage system for the district in due time after its necessity had become apparent. I am satisfied on the evidence before me that the construction of such a new sewer or sewer system as is requisite is, having regard to the size of the town and the configuration of the defendants' district, a large, expensive, and very difficult undertaking, and one requiring considerable and careful inquiry and the advice of experts, necessarily occupying a considerable time before any plan or scheme for the new sewer or system could with propriety and in the exercise of reasonable care be adopted or commenced, and the carrying out of such plan or scheme must of necessity occupy a considerable time. The difficulties in the way of the defendants are great. If, for instance, the sewer be lowered or enlarged, or if an additional or storm sewer be provided, a difficulty arises as to how the sewage or waters carried down can be disposed of, and, unless some new way were carefully thought out, it might happen that relief would be granted to the plaintiffs only by flooding the lower parts of the town to which the sewer runs after passing the plaintiffs' premises.

It appears that more than a year ago the defendants considered this question of a new sewer or drainage system and consulted experts of great eminence, who were to report as to what was the best thing to be done under the circumstances; but the report, though expected very shortly, has not yet been sent in, owing to the difficulties and magnitude of the case. Under these circumstances, I do not think that the defendants can be fairly said to have acted unreasonably or negligently in not proceeding with the construction of a new sewer or new drainage system. It was suggested that they might have consulted the experts sooner than they did. But the first complaint to them was only in June, 1891, when the flooding was caused by a storm of a most unusual character—a storm which one of the plaintiffs' witnesses (Malleon) said was the heaviest he ever saw—and the defendants might well regard this as not likely to recur. There was some evidence of overflows at the brewery before June, 1891, but no particulars were given, or dates, except that the overflows were after 1885 and near the year 1890, and no complaint was made about them to the defendants, though one of the plaintiffs' witnesses (Mr. Stretton) said that he verbally complained to a nuisance inspector. Then, after the overflow of June, 1891, nothing occurs until the floodings of May and June, 1892, and, though defendants refused to admit any liability for the damage thereby caused, it must have been shortly after this that they consulted the experts; and under these circumstances I cannot think they were guilty of negligence or of want of reasonable care and diligence in not previously taking active steps in the matter. It is, moreover, noticeable that the plaintiffs' statement of claim does not expressly allege negligence on the part of the defendants, and that on behalf of the plaintiffs in opening their case it was stated that they were not bound to allege or prove negligence.

The question now arises whether, on the above findings of fact, the defendants can be held liable. The plaintiffs put their case in this way. They say, broadly, that, as the sewer was made by and belongs to the defendants, the defendants are liable for the nuisance caused to the plaintiffs by that sewer, whether they have been guilty of negligence or not, and are not protected from such liability by any provisions of the Public Health Act or any other Act. In support of this general proposition the plaintiffs contend (i) that, apart from any statutory duty cast upon the defendants and treating the defendants as strangers who have a private sewer of their own, the defendants must be held liable; and (ii) that the defendants are liable because they have infringed the provisions of s. 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which enacts (inter alia) that "every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be constructed . . . and kept so as not to be a nuisance."

With respect to the first contention, I do not see how the plaintiffs can say that they are entitled to treat the defendants as strangers. The nuisance to the plaintiffs would not have been caused but for the communications opened by their predecessors in title with the defendants' sewer. No part of the sewage or

A water in the sewer would have got on the plaintiffs' premises but for those communications which the plaintiffs' predecessors made in exercise of the rights given to them by s. 21 of the Public Health Act or the corresponding section, s. 8 of the Sanitary Act, 1866. It was because the defendants were not strangers, but a public body making and maintaining a sewer for public purposes and for the benefit of the inhabitants of the district, that the above rights were given, and
B that the defendants were bound to allow the communications to be made, subject to the "mode" in which the communications were made being approved. It appears to me that, when under and by virtue of statutory duties and powers works are made and maintained by a public body for the benefit of the public, or of a section of the public, and a member of the public, in exercise of the statutory rights given to him, uses those works, and thus suffers damage, the rights
C of that member, and the liability of the public body in respect of such damage are to be ascertained, not by considering how matters would stand if the parties could be regarded as strangers, but by reference only to the statutes under which the works were made, maintained, and enjoyed. And to make the public body liable under the circumstances you must find that liability cast upon the public body by the statutes in question, either by express provision or reasonable intention.

This brings me to a consideration of the plaintiffs' second contention and the statutes governing the present case, and the only statute I need consider is the Public Health Act, 1875. Section 19, on which the plaintiffs rely, is in point of wording unlimited as to the liability it casts upon the defendants. But it has long since been held—and I take it to be now settled—that by reasonable construction of an Act such as this the liability in circumstances like the present,
E though in form not limited, is in fact limited to cases where the local authority has been guilty of negligence, or, as it is sometimes expressed, of want of reasonable care and diligence: see Hammond v. St. Pancras Vestry (2) and Bateman v. Poplar District Board of Works (No. 2) (3), cases under s. 72 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, which section is substantially the same as s. 19 of the Public Health Act; Brown v. Sargent (4), a case under the Public Health Act, 1848, s. 46 of which is for present purposes practically identical with s. 19 of the present Act; and, on the question of the general principle governing cases like the present, *Blyth v. This disposes of the action, for, as no legal wrong-doing by the defendants has been established, the plaintiffs are entitled neither to damages nor to an injunction, nor are they (as suggested by plaintiffs' counsel) entitled to call upon

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Kay, L.J.J.), June 13, 1893]

Landlord and Tenant—Liability of landlord—Dangerous staircase—Sole means of access to demised tenement—Injury to person visiting tenant.

An upper floor in a building was let as a separate tenement, it being approached by a staircase that remained in the possession and control of the landlord. The agreement between the landlord and the tenant contained no provision for the maintenance in repair of the staircase. While ascending the staircase to visit the tenants of the upper floor on business the plaintiff fell owing to one of the stairs being defective and suffered injury. In an action by the plaintiff against the landlord for damages for personal injuries,

Held: the landlord must be taken to have known that persons would visit the tenants on the upper floor of the building, and to do so would use the staircase, which was essential to the enjoyment of the premises demised; therefore, he was under an implied obligation to keep the stairs in a reasonably safe condition for that use; he had failed to perform that obligation; and the action succeeded.

B Appeal from the verdict and judgment in an action tried before LAWRENCE, J., with a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages from the defendant in respect of his negligence in allowing a staircase to be out of repair and in a defective and unsafe condition, whereby the plaintiff fell and was injured. The defendant was the leaseholder of a building in the city of London, the different floors of which he let out as separate tenements. In 1876, by an agreement in writing, he let the rooms on the second floor for three years to Messrs. Gwynne, engineers, for offices. The agreement contained no provision for the maintenance in repair of the staircase in the building, which was the only means of access to the second floor and remained in the possession and under the control of the defendant. When the three years' agreement expired, Messrs. Gwynne arranged with the defendant to continue in possession as tenants on the same terms, and that arrangement had continued up to the time of action brought. The plaintiff was a collector in the employment of the Midland Railway Co., and was in the habit of calling upon Messrs. Gwynne once a month on business. On the day of his receiving the injury in respect of which the action was brought, he had gone to the house on one of his visits, and was ascending the staircase to Messrs. Gwynne's tenement when he fell and broke his leg. Evidence was given at the trial to show that, at the stair where the plaintiff fell, a hollow had been worn in the surface of the stone of which the stairs were composed. At the trial, LAWRENCE, J., directed the jury that, for the purpose of their verdict, they were to assume that it was the defendant's duty to take care that the staircase was in such repair as to be safe for his tenants and those who had business with the tenants, and left to them the questions whether the staircase was so far out of repair as to be unsafe, and whether that want of repair caused the plaintiff's injury. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff and awarded him £200 damages. LAWRENCE, J., on further consideration, held that it was the defendant's duty to take care that the staircase was in such repair as to be safe, and entered judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant moved the Court of Appeal for judgment or for a new trial on the grounds of misdirection, that there was no evidence to support the verdict, that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the damages were excessive.

Bray (Murphy, Q.C., with him) for the defendant.

Moyses (Cock, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff, was not called on to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The defendant was the owner of a building in the city of London, consisting of several floors. It appears that he let the rooms on the first and second floors as separate tenements to different tenants. I gather that he kept in his possession some part of the house, at any rate, one room in it, and he did not let the staircase, the only mode of access which the tenants had to their respective tenements. So much of the house as the defendant did not let, and, therefore, the staircase, remained in the possession and control of the defendant.

I What, under such circumstances, are the rights of the tenants and the duties of the landlord towards them? Their only mode of access to their tenements was by this staircase. This may be called an easement; it was, in my opinion, such an easement as the landlord was bound to keep so as to afford a reasonably safe entrance and exit to the tenants. It seems to me that there was an implied obligation on the part of the landlord to the tenants to that effect, or else he was letting to the tenants that which would be of no value to them. What is the use of a second floor to anyone, if the staircase, by which alone there can be access to it, is to be allowed to go to ruin? Furthermore, it is obvious that in such a case the landlord must know that the premises let will be of no use to tenants unless those who supply or deal with the tenants, such as tradesmen or others having business with them, also have access to the premises. He must know that such people will go up and down the stairs; and those who use a staircase left open in premises of this kind would naturally suppose that it would, in the ordinary course of things, be under the control of and looked after by the landlord of the premises. Under those circumstances, I think that there is a relation between the landlord and those who resort to the premises for business purposes, from which a duty arises on the part of the landlord to keep the staircase in reasonably safe repair.

Is there any authority for that proposition? It seems to me that Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co. (1) is an authority for the line of reasoning which I have adopted. There the defendants, a dock company, provided gangways as a means of access to ships lying in their dock. There appears to have been no express contract between the defendants and the shipowner as to these gangways, but it was in the ordinary course of business that they provided them, and so there would be an implied contract to provide them. In the nature of things they would be necessary for the use, not only of the crew, but also of other persons having business with the ship. The court said that the defendants must have known that they would be used by such persons; and, that being so, there was a duty on their part towards persons, between whom and them there was no other relation than that created by going on board the ship on business, to have such gangways in a safe condition. Similar reasoning appears to me to apply to this case. For these reasons I think the application must be refused.

It was argued that there was no evidence to support the finding of the jury, or that, at all events, it was against the weight of evidence. I agree that the question for the jury was whether the stairs were so far out of repair as to be unsafe for people going up and down them. As to this, there was evidence both ways, and the question was, therefore, one for the jury. I see no ground for saying that they could not properly find a verdict for the plaintiff, or that the sum which they have awarded him is excessive, and, therefore, the appeal is dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant is the owner of premises, which he lets out in flats; and the plaintiff, at the time of incurring the injury which was the subject of the action, was, in the course of his duty as collector of the Midland Railway Co., going up the staircase on the defendant's premises to the flat on the second floor to do business with the tenant of that flat. In going up the stairs the plaintiff put his foot into a hollow that had been worn in the surface of a stair and fell and broke his leg.

The liability of the defendant appears to me to be clear. Beyond all question he let each of the flats to a tenant, but it is equally clear that the staircase remained in his own occupation and control. That is the determining factor in this case. The tenant could only use the flat by using the staircase; therefore, when the defendant let the rooms he must be taken, by necessary implication, to have granted to the tenant an easement to pass over the staircase in going to and from his rooms. Otherwise, as the Master of the Rolls said in the course of the argument, what the defendant would have let would be a nest, and not rooms available for business and living in. It was argued strenuously by counsel for the defendant that the grantor of a way over his own land is not bound to repair it. That is true, with this important qualification that the grantor may bind himself, either expressly or by implication, to repair the way. But this is not the case of the grant of a bare easement of a way over another person's land without special circumstances.

It appears to me obvious, when one considers what a flat of this kind is, and the only way in which it can be enjoyed, that the parties to the demise of it must have intended by necessary implication, as a basis without which the whole transaction would be futile, that the landlord should maintain the staircase, which is essential to the enjoyment of the premises demised, and should keep it reasonably safe for the use of the tenants, and also of those persons who would necessarily go

A up and down the stairs in the ordinary course of business with the tenants. A landlord must know when he lets a flat that tradesmen and other persons having business with the tenant must have access to it. It seems to me that it would render the whole transaction inefficacious and absurd if an implied undertaking were not assumed on the part of the landlord to maintain the staircase so far as might be necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the demised premises. If B that be so, the case is brought within the dictum of LORD MANSFIELD in Taylor v. Whitehead (2), to the effect that by the common law he who has the use of a thing ought to repair it, but the grantor may bind himself. When the conclusion is once arrived at that there is an implied undertaking by the landlord, the rest seems to me to follow by a course of reasoning which is clear and covered by authority. The landlord has given the tenant a right to use the staircase, and undertaken to C keep it in repair; and he knows that persons who have business with the tenant will be coming up and down the stairs, and that those persons will use the stairs on the understanding that they may lawfully do so, and that, in doing so, they will be shielded by the responsibility of the person on whom the liability to repair the staircase may rest.

That being so, the case appears to me to be brought within the principle upon D which Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co. (1) was decided. In my opinion, it is clear, both on principle and authority, that a duty was imposed by law upon the defendant towards persons using the staircase in the course of business with the tenants to keep it reasonably safe.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question here is whether the duty E to keep the staircase in a safe condition fell upon the landlord or the tenant. The staircase was not let, but was retained by the landlord in his own possession; the tenants of the flats, however, had the right to use it, and, therefore, they had an easement over it. It may be that, to preserve that easement, as between himself and the landlord, a tenant might have a right to repair the staircase, but that does not conclude the question whether it was the duty of the landlord, as between F himself and the tenant, or as between himself and persons in the position of the plaintiff, i.e., persons who might go up and down the staircase in the course of business with the tenant, to keep the staircase in such a condition that it might be safely used. It seems to me that, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, a duty existed on the part of the landlord to keep the staircase in a safe condition, and, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain his action.

An action for contribution is maintainable by one co-surety against another before the plaintiff has actually paid more than his own proportion of the joint and several liability. Where, therefore, one of several co-sureties, being threatened by the principal creditors with proceedings to enforce payment by her of the whole amount of the guarantee, brought an action against one of the other co-sureties to obtain contribution from him, the court declared the plaintiff's right to contribution and directed that upon her paying her own share the defendant was to indemnify her against further payment or liability, and was by payment to the plaintiff or the principal creditors or otherwise to exonerate her from liability beyond the extent of her own share.

A bankruptcy petition having been presented against a co-surety for a sum of money advanced by a bank to a company and a receiving order having been made against him on that petition, the debtor made a proposal for a composition in satisfaction of his debts which was accepted by the creditors and approved by the court, the receiving order being rescinded and a final dividend being paid. In an action by the debtor's co-surety for contribution,

Held: the liability of the debtor to contribute, although not ascertained at the time of the bankruptcy proceedings, not included in his schedule of liabilities or in the claims or proofs, and not a debt in respect of which an adjudication of bankruptcy could have been sustained was nevertheless a liability within the meaning of s. 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [see now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 30 (3)], and a debt provable in the bankruptcy, and, accordingly, under s. 18 of the Act [see now s. 16 (13) of the Act of 1914] the debtor was entitled to be dismissed from the action.

In an action by a surety against a co-surety for contribution the Statute of Limitations does not begin to run against the plaintiff until his liability is ascertained.

May 1, 1893. WRIGHT, J., read the following judgment. This case raises an important question with respect to which there is a remarkable absence of express authority. The plaintiff is the executrix of a person who became surety with four others for a large sum of money advanced by a bank to a company. The surety's estate is being administered in the court, and the bankers put in a claim as creditors for the whole amount of the guarantee. The plaintiff resisted the claim, and succeeded in reducing it from about £6,000, and it has been finally allowed for a sum of about £4,500. The plaintiff is now called upon to pay that sum, and brings this action against the co-sureties for contribution. The plaintiff has not yet paid anything. C D

The defendant Patton I have dismissed from the action on the ground that he is discharged by a composition under s. 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, inasmuch as it appears to me that his liability to contribute, although not ascertained at the time of the bankruptcy proceedings, not included in his schedule of liabilities nor in the claims or proofs, and not a debt in respect of which an adjudication of bankruptcy could have been sustained, was nevertheless a liability within the meaning of s. 37 of the Act, and, therefore, a debt provable in the bankruptcy: cf., Hardy v. Fothergill (1). The principal defence of the other defendant Gullick is that the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain this action until she has paid more than her proportion, or, at any rate, until she has paid her proportion. The plaintiff is willing to pay her proportion, but she insists that the actual payment of it is not a condition precedent to her right to sue; and she says that at any rate she is not obliged to pay the whole in the first instance and then sue for reimbursement. If she is obliged to pay the whole before actual contribution from the co-surety, the business in which the testator's assets are invested will be embarrassed by the withdrawal of so much of the capital even for a short time. Obviously, if a man were surety with nine others for £10,000, it might be a ruinous hardship if he were compelled to raise the whole £10,000 at once, and perhaps to pay interest on the £9,000 until he could recover the £9,000 by actions or debtor summonses against his co-sureties. The questions are, whether the action can be maintained, and what is the precise extent of the relief (if any) which can be given. E F G

By the Roman law, as it stood in the time of JUSTINIAN, sureties had, generally speaking, the right to compel the creditor to enforce payment against them pro rata only. The superior courts of common law in this country have never entertained any action for contribution by a surety against his co-surety, except the action for money paid, and from the time of Davies v. Humphreys (2), which was decided in 1840, it has been treated as settled law that the surety cannot maintain this action until he has actually paid more than his own proportion, because this action assumes a debt due and payable to the plaintiff, and there is no legal debt due and payable, and the creditor may yet enforce payment of the whole balance from the co-surety. Nor did the courts of common law ever give in the case of co-sureties the equitable relief which they were accustomed to give in many other cases of joint or common liability, by compelling contribution after judgment and before execution by means of a writ of audita querela or scire facias to limit the creditor's execution to the proper share payable by the particular defendant. This will be seen from the collection of ancient cases in 3 Co. Rep., p. 12 et seq. By the custom of the city of London an equitable action lay in the city courts by a H I

A surety before he had paid anything to have it ordered that he and his co-sureties should be charged pro rata only—ut uterque eorum oneretur pro rata: Offley and Johnson's Case (3).

In the earliest reports and abridgements of cases in Chancery there is frequent mention of contribution, but there seems to be no reported instance of contribution between sureties before the seventeenth century; and even in modern times there is very little express authority that the surety has any remedy until he has actually paid too much, and still less authority to show the precise extent of the relief to which he may be entitled before such payment. In nearly every reported case the surety had before action paid more than his share. Nearly every case and text-book refers to his right to contribution as the right of a surety who has paid more than his proportion. In a few cases the ambiguous expression is used, "when he is called upon to pay more than his proportion."

The following are, I believe, the only reported cases which throw any light on the subject. I begin with two, which are not cases of suretyship, but which illustrate a principle of equity apparently established in other cases of contribution and applicable to this. They are cited in VIN. ABR., tit. "Contribution," pp. 32, 33, from CARY'S REPORTS, and are as follows:

D "If a man grants a rentcharge out of all his lands, afterwards sells his land by parcels to divers persons, and the grantee of the rent will from time to time levy the whole rent upon one of the purchasers only, he shall be eased in Chancery by a contribution from the rest of the purchasers, and the grantee shall be restrained by order to charge the same upon him only": (Anon. (4)).

E In the second case (Anon. (5)) the facts were as follows:

"In 1603 Sir Edmund Morgan married the widow of Fortescue; he had his wife's lands distrained alone by the grantee of a rentcharge from her former husband, and therefore sued the grantee in Chancery to take a rateable part of the rent, according to the lands he held, subject to the distress; and notwithstanding POPHAM, L.C.J.'s report, who thought this reasonable, the LORD CHANCELLOR EGERTON would give him on his bill no relief, but ordered that he should exhibit his bill against the rest of the tenants and grantee both, the one to show cause why they should not contribute, the other why he should not accept of the rent equally; otherwise it was no reason to take away the benefit of distress from the grantee which the law gave him."

Three cases of contribution between sureties in the time of Charles I are reported. G In Peter v. Rich (6) the principle was established that in equity, if one of several co-sureties is insolvent, the others contribute as if he had not been a surety. There the plaintiff had paid the whole. In Morgan v. Seymour (7) the principle upon which the above-cited cases from CARY'S REPORTS and the subsequent leading case of Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (8) were decided, seems to be applied in the fullest extent to the case of co-sureties, the principal creditor being made a party H to the suit, and the co-surety being ordered to pay direct to the creditor. The report is as follows (1 Rep. Ch. at pp. 120, 121):

"The plaintiff, with Sir Edward Seymour, the defendant, being bound with Sir William St. Johns for the proper debt of the said St. Johns to the defendant Rowland in a bond of £200 for the payment of £100, and the said Rowland sued the plaintiff only on the said bond, the plaintiff seeks to have the said Seymour contribute and pay his part of the said debt and damages, the said St. Johns being insolvent. This court was of opinion that the said Seymour ought to contribute and pay one moiety to the said Rowland, and decreed Rowland to assign over the said bond to the plaintiff and Seymour, to help themselves against the said St. Johns for the said debt."

I In Swain v. Wall (9) the plaintiff surety had paid the whole of the creditors' demand, and the only point decided was that his claim for contribution might be controlled by express contract.

In Hole v. Harrison (10) (1673) the rule in Peter v. Rich (6) was followed. In 1786, in Lawson v. Wright (11) the plaintiff co-surety had paid off the whole liability, and he sued for contribution. SIR LLOYD KENYON said that it had been established ever since the origin of the courts of equity that one surety had a right to call upon another for contribution in cases of this nature. The only question was whether proof of payment by the surety was enough without proof that the principal debtor was insolvent. The arguments seem to show that counsel and the court thought that an action could be maintained by a surety for contribution before he had paid anything, if he could prove the principal debtor to be insolvent. In 1787 the leading case of Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (8) was decided in the Exchequer as a court of equity by EYRE, L.C.B. There a surety by bond for £4,000 to the Crown had had judgment against him at the suit of the Crown for nearly the whole amount, and he filed his bill for contribution against sureties bound by distinct bonds to the same creditor to secure the same liability of the same debtor, and the only point reported as argued or decided was whether there should be contribution between sureties bound under distinct contracts of suretyship without privity of contract between themselves. After deciding that the right to contribution depends primarily, not upon contract, but upon the equitable principle that the court proceeded to declare the plaintiff's right to contribution, and ordered the other sureties to pay their shares to the creditor.

No similar order is to be found in any other case of sureties except that of Morgan v. Seymour (7). But it is in strict accordance with the principle of the cases cited from CARY'S REPORTS, and it is hardly possible to suppose that so obvious and important a matter as the jurisdiction to make such an order could have been overlooked. It appears, from the report of the case in 2 Bos. & P., though not from the report in 1 Cox, Eq. Cas., that the Crown as creditor was made a defendant to the bill under the name of the Attorney-General; and there could not have been any object in this except that the creditor should be controlled and prevented from enforcing his legal right inequitably against one alone of the sureties. That nothing so important was overlooked may be inferred from the remarkable observations of LORD ELDON, who had himself argued the case, and said in Craythorne v. Swinburne (12) (1807) (14 Ves. at pp. 165, 169, 171) :

“In the case of Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (8), which, I recollect, was argued with great perseverance . . . it is decided that, whether they are bound by several instruments or not, whether the fact is or is not known, whether the number is more or less, the principle of equity operates in both cases; upon the maxim, that equality is equity: the creditor, who can call upon all, shall not be at liberty to fix one with payment of the whole debt; and upon the principle, requiring him to do justice, if he will not, the court will do it for him. . . . I argued that case, and was much dissatisfied with the whole proceeding, and with the judgment; but I have been since convinced that the decision was upon the right principles. LORD EYRE, C.J., in that case decided that this obligation of co-sureties is not founded in contract, but stands upon a principle of equity; and SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY has very ably put, what is consistent with every idea, that, after that principle of equity has been universally acknowledged, then persons acting under circumstances, to which it applies, may properly be said to act under the head of contract implied from the universality of that principle. Upon that ground stands the jurisdiction assumed by courts of law. . . . The doctrine of contribution . . . stands upon this, that all sureties are equally liable to the creditor, and it does not rest with him to determine, upon whom the burden shall be thrown exclusively; that equality is equity; and, if he will not make the contribution equally, this court will finally by arrangement secure that object.”

A Several other cases of contribution between sureties occur in the books in LORD ELDON's time, but in none of them is there any reference to the point in question. In Ex parte Gifford (13) (1802), LORD ELDON said (6 Ves. at p. 808):

B "The principle is to discharge all the obligations of all the sureties; but they stand with regard to each other in a relation, which gives rise to this right among others, that, if one pays more than his proportion, there shall be a contribution for a proportion of the excess beyond the proportion which in all events he is to pay."

In Craythorne v. Swinburne (12) (1807) LORD ELDON states the right of the surety in these terms (14 Ves. at p. 164):

C "It has long been settled that if there are co-sureties by the same instrument, and the creditor calls upon either of them to pay the principal debt or any part of it, that surety has a right in this court, either upon a principle of equity, or upon contract, to call upon his co-surety for contribution."

D In Antrobus v. Davidson (14) (1817) it was held that the creditor cannot bring an action quia timet against a surety to force him to set apart money to provide for the mere possibility of a debt becoming due from the principal debtor. In 1821, in Stirling v. Forrester (15), in the House of Lords, LORD REDESDALE said (3 Bli. at pp. 590, 596):

E "The principle established in the case of Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (8) is universal, that the right and duty of contribution is founded in doctrines of equity; it does not depend upon contract. If several persons are indebted, and one makes the payment, the creditor is bound in conscience, if not by contract, to give to the party paying the debt all his remedies against the other debtors. The cases of average in equity rest upon the same principle. It would be against equity for the creditor to exact or receive payment from one, and to permit, or by his conduct to cause, the other debtors to be exempt from payment. He is bound, seldom by contract, but always in conscience, so far as he is able to put the party paying the debt upon the same footing with those who are equally bound. That was the principle of decision in Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (8). . . . The question depends upon equity; not upon contract, and in this case a contract is to be implied. The decision in Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (8) proceeded on a principle of law which must exist in all countries that when several persons are debtors all shall be equal."

G In Reynolds v. Wheeler (16) (1861), which was an action for money paid, ERLE, C.J., said:

"If one surety is called on to pay the whole debt, he is entitled to have contribution from his co-surety";

H and WILLIAMS, J., said:

"It is now well established by many cases that, where two parties stand in the relation of co-sureties, and one of them is applied to for more than his share, he is entitled to call upon his companion for reimbursement."

I Having regard, however, to the common law, as settled by Davies v. Humphreys (2), it seems plain that these expressions must be understood as assuming actual payment by the plaintiff of more than his share. In 1868, in Wooldridge v. Norris (17), executors of a surety obtained an order for indemnity and payment by a person who had covenanted to indemnify the testator against his liability as surety, although the executors had not paid or been sued. The judgment, however, proceeded on the particular terms of the covenant. In the same year, in Cruse v. Paine (18), where a vendor of shares was entitled to be indemnified by his vendee against calls, LORD HATHERLEY declared the liability of the vendee for future calls, and ordered him to indemnify the vendor's estate, and to procure its release or discharge "either by payment of the calls or otherwise," with liberty to apply in chambers, etc. A

In 1872, in Bechervaise v. Lewis (19), WILLES, J., said (L.R. 7 C.P. at p. 377):

"The surety . . . as soon as his obligation to pay is become absolute, has a right in equity to be exonerated by his principal."

In 1874, in Lacey v. Hill, Crowley's Claim (20), upon a creditor's claim in an administration action, SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said: B

"Whatever may be the case at law . . . it is quite plain that in this court any one having a right to be indemnified has a right to have a sufficient sum set apart for that indemnity. It is not material to consider whether he is entitled to have that sum paid to him, or whether it must be paid direct over to the creditor. If the creditor is not a party, I believe it has been decided that the party seeking indemnity may be entitled to have the money paid over to him." C

In 1877, in Lloyd v. Dimmack (21), FRY, J., refused to declare prospectively the right of the assignor of a long lease to indemnity against future breaches of contract by the assignee; and in Hughes-Hallett v. Indian Mammoth Gold Mines Co. (22) the same learned judge refused to make an order quia timet against a person for whom the plaintiff held shares to indemnify the plaintiff, there being no evidence that calls were likely to be made; but said (22 Ch.D. at p. 565): D

"There have been, undoubtedly, cases in which, where a contract for indemnity existed, and a right to sue upon that contract had arisen, the court has declared the right to indemnity generally, and has put matters in such a train that, when the subsequent right to indemnity should arise, the indemnity might be worked out. Some forms of judgments in that class of cases are to be found in the last [4th Edn.] edition of SETON ON DECREES, and they show that where a person has taken shares for another, and a call has been made, which has not been met by the person liable to pay it, the trustee, who is entitled to an indemnity, may obtain a declaration of his title generally, and may possibly obtain liberty to apply from time to time to work it out." E

So, also in the similar case of Hobbs v. Wayet (23), where a call on shares was also threatened, KEKEWICH, J., made a declaration of the right to indemnity. The preceding cases from Cruse v. Paine (18) downwards have been referred to, not as having any direct bearing on the rights of co-sureties, but as throwing some light on the nature and extent of the relief which can be given in equity in analogous matters. F

There are only two remaining direct authorities. In 1881, in Ex parte Snowdon (24), a surety who had paid his own share and no more, and who had not been called upon to pay more, issued a debtor's summons against his co-surety for half of what had been paid, and he obtained an adjudication of bankruptcy, which the Court of Appeal annulled on the ground that, until a surety had paid more than his share, there is no legal or equitable debt to sustain bankruptcy proceedings. In the report in 17 Ch.D. at pp. 46, 47, JAMES, L.J., is reported to have said: G

"I think your proper remedy is to call on Snowdon to pay back the £541. . . . I believe the proper course when a surety is called upon to pay a part of the whole debt for which he is liable would be to bring an action against his co-sureties to compel them to contribute to pay the debt to the creditor just as he would be entitled to call on them for contribution if he had been sued by the creditor asking that he should be indemnified by his co-sureties against paying the whole debt or whatever risk he ran." H

The report in 50 L.J.Ch. at p. 541 is as follows: I

"The proper course when a surety is called upon to pay the whole debt for which he is liable with his co-surety is to call upon his co-surety for contribution, and to indemnify him against paying the whole, and the only mode in

A which in equity you can compel a co-surety to pay his proportion of the debt is to show that you have paid your proportion or more than your proportion of the debt, and are liable for the residue."

In 29 W.R. 654 it is as follows :

B "The proper course when a surety is called upon to pay the whole debt for which he is liable would be to call upon his co-sureties for contribution . . . just as he would be entitled to have done if a bill had been filed against him by the principal creditor asking that he should be indemnified against paying the whole."

C In 1883, in Macdonald v. Whitfield (25), LORD WATSON, pro cur., declared the right to contribution of a surety who had not paid his share, but had had judgment against him in the form that he was "entitled and liable to equal contribution inter se."

In LINDLEY, L.J.'s work on PARTNERSHIP (5th Edn.), p. 374, it is observed that :

D "Before the passing of the Judicature Acts, a right to contribution or indemnity, arising otherwise than by special agreement, was only enforceable at law by a person who could prove that he had already sustained a loss. But in equity it was very reasonably held that even in the absence of any special agreement, a person who was entitled to contribution or indemnity from another could enforce his right before he had sustained actual loss, provided loss was imminent; and this principle will now prevail in all Divisions of the High Court. Therefore, a person who is entitled to be thus indemnified against loss is not obliged to wait until he has suffered and perhaps been ruined, before having recourse to judicial aid. Thus, in the ordinary case of principal and surety, as soon as the creditor has acquired a right to immediate payment from the surety, the latter is entitled to call upon the principal debtor to pay the amount of the debt guaranteed, so as to relieve the surety from his obligation; and where one person has covenanted to indemnify another, an action for specific performance may be sustained before the plaintiff has actually been damaged; and the limit of the defendant's liability to the plaintiff is the full amount for which he is liable; or, if he is dead or insolvent, the full amount provable against his estate, and not only the amount of dividend which such estate can pay. In strict conformity with these principles partners and directors who are individually liable to be sued on bonds and notes, which as between them and their co-partners are to be regarded as the bonds and notes of the firm or company, are entitled to call for contribution before these bonds or notes have been actually paid. So a trustee of shares, liable to calls, is entitled to be indemnified by his cestui que trust against them before they are paid."

H This statement of the law is an authority in favour of the view that some relief can be given, but it does not specify the form or limit of the relief; nor do any of the authorities cited in the notes throw any further light on the matter. Nor have I been able to obtain any assistance from English or American writers on equity or on the law of suretyship. The plaintiff's difficulties have been increased by this, that an application by her for leave to use the third party procedure ordinarily applicable in cases of contribution or indemnity was refused in the administration action on the ground that this procedure is not available in an administration action. Even if the question had arisen upon third party procedure, nearly the same difficulty would have occurred. In this state of the authorities I think that, if the plaintiff had made the creditors defendants to the present action, I ought to have held that the allowance of the principal creditors' claim in the administration action was equivalent to a judgment against the plaintiff for the whole amount of the guarantee, and that on the precedent of Morgan v. Seymour (7) and of Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (8) the plaintiff would have been entitled to a declaration of her right to contribution, and to an order upon the solvent co-surety to pay his proportion to the principal creditors. The principal creditors not being parties, I think that I cannot order payment to them or directly prevent them from enforcing their judgment against the plaintiff alone. Nor could I at present order the co-surety to pay his half to the plaintiff, for the plaintiff cannot give him a discharge as against the principal creditors; and this case is not like the case of a plaintiff who merely claims indemnity, as in the cases referred to by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Lacey v. Hill, Crowley's Claim (20) (L.R. 18 Eq. at p. 891), in which no question arises as to any other party. But I think that I can declare the plaintiff's rights, and make a prospective order under which, whenever she has paid any sum beyond her share, she can get it back. A

I, therefore, declare the plaintiff's right to contribution, and direct that, upon the plaintiff paying her own share, the defendant Gullick is to indemnify her against further payment or liability, and is by payment to her or the principal creditors or otherwise to exonerate the plaintiff from liability beyond the extent of her own share. The plaintiff must have liberty to apply in chambers generally. B

A point was made as to the Statutes of Limitation. The principal creditors' claim was made in 1879, but I think that I must hold that, even if the statute began to run before the surety has paid more than his proportion, at any rate it does not run until his liability is ascertained, and that did not occur until 1890. D There was a further point made that the plaintiff ought to have proved against the estate of the co-surety Patton; but, if that were so, so also might have the defendant Gullick. It is agreed that, if such proof could have been and had been made, it is to be taken that £200 would have been received. I think that the plaintiff and defendant should each bear half of this, and the defendant's liability to the plaintiff will be reduced accordingly by £100. I think that the plaintiff acted E reasonably, and in the interest of all parties in resisting and reducing the principal creditors' claim, and that the defendant ought in equity to contribute half the costs of those proceedings. As to the question of costs, see Kemp v. Finden (26), Lawson v. Wright (11), Hole v. Harrison (10). I, therefore, give judgment in that form in favour of the plaintiff, with costs.

C Where branches of trees overhang the soil of an adjacent landowner he is entitled to remove those branches without notice to his neighbour on whose side of the boundary the trees grow, provided that in abating the nuisance he does acts exclusively on his own land and does not trespass on the land of his neighbour.

Easement—Tree—Right to allow tree to overhang neighbouring land.

D Trees grow as time passes and their condition each year is different from what it was the year before, and, therefore, the owner of trees which overhang his neighbour's land cannot acquire an easement giving him a right to continue to allow the trees so to overhang although his neighbour has acquiesced in the overhanging for more than twenty years.

H Appeal by the plaintiff in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, LOPES and KAY, L.JJ.), reported [1894] 3 Ch. 1, reversing a decision of KEKEWICH, J.

I In 1869 the appellant purchased a property called Malquoits, situated near Guildford, Surrey, and comprising about twenty-one acres. In 1879 he purchased another estate, called Ewhurst Place, of about 106 acres, the boundaries of which marched with those of Malquoits. In 1881 the appellant sold Malquoits to the respondent. At that time there were growing along the boundary between the two estates, but upon the land of Ewhurst Place, a number of large trees, the branches of which overhung the soil of Malquoits. The respondent, without giving any notice to the appellant, lopped off the branches that overhung his land, whereupon the appellant instituted the present proceedings with the object of obtaining a declaration that the respondent was not entitled, without giving notice to the appellant, to cut any branches of the appellant's trees which overhung the respondent's land when such overhanging had continued for many years, an injunction to restrain the respondent from cutting the branches, and damages. The action was heard by KEKEWICH, J., who gave judgment for the appellant, and ordered the respondent to pay him £5 damages and costs. The respondent having appealed, the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of KEKEWICH, J., and directed judgment to be entered for the respondent. The appellant appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., and R. F. Norton for the appellant.

Marten, Q.C., and J. Bradford, for the respondent, were not called on to argue.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The question raised by this appeal is a very short one, namely, whether where branches of trees overhang the soil of another person, the person whose soil they overhang is entitled to remove those branches without notice to his neighbour on whose side of the boundary the trees grow. It is not disputed that, if such notice be given, and if the neighbour do not remove the boughs, the person whose land they overhang would be entitled to do so. That is subject to the questions raised on the Prescription Act and the Statute of Limitations, which I will deal with in a moment. This, of course, involves an admission that against the will of the owner of the land over which the branches hang, the owner of the timber cannot insist that the boughs shall remain on it, the only question being whether he is entitled to notice so that he may remove the boughs himself, or whether the person complaining of them may remove them without giving notice.

As regards the right, the difference does not seem to me to be one of extreme importance. In the present case, I think it is extremely probable that the appellant would not have removed the boughs, and that the respondent would have removed them after all. Nevertheless if, in point of law, the person complaining of them can only remove them after notice, then the plaintiff in such an action as this action would be entitled to recover. It might be a reasonable provision of the law that such a notice should be required, but whether it would be any great protection to the owners of trees near the boundary of their neighbour's land may be doubted. It might be very reasonable that there should be some law regulating the rights of neighbours in respect of trees which, if planted near the boundary, necessarily tend to overhang the soil of a neighbour. It may be, and probably is, generally a very unneighbourly act to cut down the branches of overhanging trees unless they are doing some substantial harm to the neighbour. The case is a very common one. Trees constantly do overhang, and it certainly might call for the intervention of the legislature if it became a common practice for neighbours to exercise what may be their legal rights in thus cutting off what would frequently be a considerable portion of trees which grow on the other side of their boundary.

But the question is whether there is any authority for the proposition that notice must be given by the owner of the land over which the trees overhang before removing the encroaching boughs. In support of the proposition that notice is requisite not a single authority has been cited. It is certain that the boughs of trees have overhung, and that those whose land they have overhung have removed them, on many occasions. Actions in respect of such removal have occurred from time to time, the point at issue generally being whether the soil over which the branches spread was the soil of the one person or the other; but I never heard it suggested in any of those cases (and certainly I can remember more than one within my own experience) that notice ought to be given to the adjoining owner before the boughs could be removed.

What are the only authorities to which appeal has been made? They are cases where a nuisance has existed on neighbouring soil, and the person complaining of the nuisance could only get rid of it by going on to the soil of his neighbour. There, no doubt, it has been held that he cannot justify going on to the soil of his neighbour to remove the nuisance, except in the case of emergency, unless he has first

A given his neighbour notice to remove. That is because his act involves an interference with his neighbour's soil—a trespass. Those cases are clearly distinguishable from the present case where the act does not involve a trespass, but what is complained of is an encroachment on the soil of the man who removes the boughs, and what he does in getting rid of the encroachment is done on his own land, and, therefore, prima facie needs no excuse so far as the place where he is doing the act is concerned.

The only dictum that can be found on the subject is a dictum of BEST, J., in Earl of Lonsdale v. Nelson (1) (2 B. & C. at p. 311), a case which is not in point, inasmuch as there the court had to determine whether the defendant could do acts upon his neighbour's land which involved considerable interference with his rights of property. BEST, J., says:

C “Nuisances by an act of commission are committed in defiance of those whom such nuisances injure, and the injured party may abate them without notice to the person who committed them; but there is no decided case which sanctions the abatement by an individual of nuisances from omission, except that of cutting the branches of trees which overhang a public road, or the private property of the person who cuts them.”

D There is, therefore, that dictum of BEST, J., on the point, but what seems to me more important is that there is no dictum whatever to be found to the contrary, nor any decided case. If we held otherwise we should not be interpreting the law, we should be making the law—and making the law, not by the application of old principles to meet a new case, but by laying down conditions and limitations for the exercise of rights in a class of cases which has existed so long as the growth of trees and boundaries between neighbours have existed. Therefore, it seems to me to be a case in which it is out of the question that we should lay down any law beyond that which, so far as we can find, has been regarded as the law in times gone by. In my opinion, therefore, there is no warrant for saying that notice was requisite.

F As regards the question whether the appellant has acquired any right by reason of the length of time these trees have overhung, I think it is impossible to say that he has either acquired a right to the land over which they hang or to their overhanging. The trees grow from time to time, and their state each year is different from what it was the year before. The same remark applies to the suggestion that a prescriptive right has been obtained. The tree of today is not in the condition in which it was twenty years ago. It would be idle to suggest that the right gained at any time was the right to have the tree there in the condition in which it was twenty years ago, and that it was open to the adjoining owner to put back the tree into the conditions in which it was twenty years ago, because it is only a right to what has remained for twenty years that is gained by prescription, and the exercise of such a right would be almost always, if not always, completely destructive of the tree. It seems to me impossible to say, in a case of this description, that a right is gained either by statute or under the ordinary law of prescription. Those points, indeed, were very faintly urged (and one can quite understand why) by the learned counsel for the appellant. They rested their appeal mainly on the allegation that the appellant was entitled to notice before the respondent did the acts complained of, and I think they have not established the proposition for which they contended. I move your Lordships that the judgment I appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is clear that a man is not bound to permit a neighbour's tree to overhang the surface of his land, however long the space above may have been interfered with by the growth of the tree. Nor can it, I think, be doubted that, if he can get rid of the interference or encroachment without committing a trespass, or entering upon the land of his neighbour, he may do so whenever he pleases, and that no notice or previous communication is required by law. That, I think, is the good sense of the matter; and there is certainly no authority or dictum to the contrary. Whether the same rule would necessarily apply to the case of trees so young that the owner might remove them intact if he chose to lift them, or to the case of shrubs capable of being transplanted, may perhaps be worthy of consideration. That, however, is not the case here. It is admitted that the trees here are of great age, and the only possible remedy was by cutting or lopping the offending branches. I am of opinion that the respondent has not exceeded his legal right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD DAVEY.—The only question which is submitted to your Lordships is whether the respondent was within his rights in taking upon himself to cut the branches of certain trees so far as they overhung his land, or whether, before taking that step, he ought to have given notice to the appellant of what he proposed to do. Your Lordships are asked, in a question affecting real property, to lay down a proposition which, so far as I can see, has no authority in support of it; indeed, the authorities, so far as they go, seem to me to be opposed to any such idea. It is true that where a person desires to abate a nuisance which can only be abated by going on the land of the person from whom the nuisance proceeds, he must give notice of his intention to do so. That seems to me to be reasonable, because his act of going upon his neighbour's land is prima facie a trespass, and I can understand that he should be bound to give notice of his intention to do that which would be prima facie a trespass before doing it. But in the cases of which the present is an example, where a man proposes to abate a nuisance exclusively by doing acts upon his own land without going upon the land of his neighbour from whom the nuisance proceeds, the same reasoning does not seem to me to apply.

The appellant's counsel very fairly admit that they have no authority directly in point; but they base a very ingenious argument upon Earl of Lonsdale v. Nelson (1). They say that BEST, J., there lays it down that cutting trees which overhang your land is an exception from the general rule that nuisances of omission cannot be abated without notice to the person from whom they proceed. Stopping there, if we are to adopt BEST, J.'s judgment as stating the law, it is really an authority against the appellant. But the learned counsel for the appellant go on to say that there is no authority except the dictum of BEST, J. (which is not binding as an authority upon your Lordships' House), for the exception. It was naturally asked what was the authority for the rule from which this is supposed to be an exception; and I confess that, notwithstanding the evident industry which the learned counsel for the appellant have bestowed upon the case, they have not satisfied my mind that there is any authority for the rule from which BEST, J., is supposed to have treated the case of trees as an exception. Whether that rule exists or not I know not—at least beyond this, that no authority has been cited to us in favour of that proposition. Earl of Lonsdale v. Nelson (1), so far as it goes, is an authority against the appellant, because, if the rule exists, then we have the authority of LORD WYNFORD for saying that the case of trees is an exception from it.

The dictum of CROKE, J. (1 Roll. 394), seems to me to be against the appellant:

That is to say, if the boughs of your tree encroach upon my land I may cut them. He says not a word about notice. Therefore, so far as that goes, it is an authority against the appellant. Then, my Lords, it appears to me that Pickering v. Rudd (2) is also an authority against the appellant. In that case the defendant managed, by an arrangement of poles, and scaffolding, and ropes, to cut away so much of a Virginian creeper planted on the plaintiff's land as encroached upon his land. There was no allegation that notice had been given, and no point was made either way of notice having been given or not having been given. So far as that case

A goes, it is an authority against the appellant, because it was held there by the court that the defendant was justified in cutting away so much of the Virginian creeper as encroached upon his land; and although, no doubt, every point was taken in that case that could be taken, nothing was said about the necessity for any notice beforehand. Penruddock's Case (3) does not seem to me to assist the appellant, because the point which was decided in that case was, whether a writ of quod permittat prosternere would lie against the alienee of the person who had levied the nuisance, and the judges in that case said this:

"It was moved in the King's Bench, if the feoffee might abate the nuisance as the feoffor himself, and as well in the hands of the feoffee who did not the nuisance as in the hands of the tort-fesor himself; and if the feoffee of the house to which the nuisance was made might do it (if he could do it) before he had some special prejudice, as in the dropping of the water, or if he ought to stay till he had special prejudice. And POPHAM, C.J., held that in both cases the feoffee might abate the nuisance, and that before any prejudice, for it is reasonable that he should prevent his prejudice and not stay till it be done, which was granted by the whole court."

C

D It is quite true that it was held that in that case the writ quod permittat prosternere would not lie against the feoffee of the person who levied the nuisance without notice to him; but from the facts of that case it is perfectly obvious that what had to be done in order to abate the nuisance, which would involve the removal of a portion of the defendant's house, could only be done by going on the land. Therefore, I do not think that Penruddock's Case (3) affords any authority to the learned counsel for the appellant for the proposition which they have submitted to your Lordships' House.

I think it sufficient, therefore, to say that no authority has been cited to this House for the appellant's proposition; the authorities, so far as they go, are rather against it than in favour of it; and when we come to look at the reason of the thing I entirely agree with what has fallen from my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, that there is no such obvious consideration of justice as would induce this House to lay down, for the first time, the proposition contended for by the appellant.

Per LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.: If an owner of goods places them for sale in the hands of an agent, and if that agent, to implement an open contract into which he has already entered, delivers those goods to the person who has made that contract with him in such a way that upon delivery the sale becomes complete and the obligation to pay the price arises, that is just as much a sale of the principal's goods to that person, and just as much makes the purchaser liable to the principal and liable to be sued by the principal, as if the agent had had no contract before the goods were delivered and had afterwards made the only contract that was ever made.

Appeal from a decision of the majority of the Second Division of the Court of Session, the Lord Justice-Clerk (LORD MACDONALD), and LORD TRAYNER, LORD YOUNG dissenting, affirming a decision of the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire in an action of multiple pawning.

A Finlay, Q.C., Sanderson, and Aitken (the last-named of the Scottish Bar) for the appellants.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., and Leck for the respondents.

B LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—This action was tried in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, and an interlocutor was pronounced in favour of the present respondents in that court. This interlocutor was affirmed in the Court of Session by the Lord Justice-Clerk (LORD MACDONALD) and LORD TRAYNER, LORD YOUNG dissenting. The proceedings arose out of the arrestment by the present respondents of a debt due or alleged to be due from Alexander Cross & Co. to the firm of Charles Page & Co. The respondents were undoubtedly creditors of Page & Co.; and if that debt, which certainly was due by Cross & Co., was a debt due to Page & Co., such that it was the property of Page & Co., then clearly the arrest was good, and there would be no ground for this proceeding. The appellants, however, contend that the debt which Cross & Co. owed was the price of a cargo sold to them, that the cargo was sold to them by Page & Co. as the agents of the appellants, the North Western Bank, and that, therefore, the debt was really the property of the North Western Bank, and consequently could not be arrested by a creditor of Page & Co. I do not understand it to be disputed that, if in fact the goods sold were the property of the North Western Bank, then, although the sale may have been a sale by Page & Co. to Cross & Co., yet, being then made, if it was made, on their behalf as owners by Page & Co., it could not be attached by a creditor of Page & Co., and certainly there is no decision or indication of any opinion to the contrary in the court below.

E The transaction between Page & Co. and the North Western Bank upon which the appellants rely took place in April, 1892, the arrest being on May 3, 1892. Messrs. Page & Co. had on their way certain goods for which they held a bill of lading, and they desired upon this bill of lading to obtain an advance. On April 4, 1892, a letter was written by the manager of the bank (which was admitted by a subsequent letter of Page & Co. to detail correctly the conditions on which the advance was made), in which the terms on which the bank were willing to make the advance were stated. The letter was as follows :

G “Dear Sirs,—We now beg to put in writing the conditions on which we advance to you the sum of £5,000, say five thousand pounds, repayable by you on or before June 1, on the security of the undermentioned merchandise, which you pledge to us and warehouse in our name. It is distinctly agreed that we are to have immediate and absolute power of sale, and under that power we authorise and empower you to enter into contracts for the sale of the merchandise on our behalf in the ordinary course of business, and we expressly direct you to pay to us from time to time the proceeds of all such sales immediately and specifically as received by you, to be applied towards payment of the said advance, interest, commission, and all charges. You are at any time at our request to give us full authority to receive all sums due or to become due from any person or persons in respect of any sales of the merchandise so made by you on our behalf. You are to insure the merchandise against all fire risks.”

H At the end of the letter there is a statement of the particulars of the merchandise—1,629 tons of phosphate rock by the ship Cyprus, and 1,826 tons of phosphate rock by the ship Storra Lee.

I On the occasion when that letter was written and the arrangement entered into, the bill of lading for the phosphate rock per the Cyprus was handed, endorsed in blank, by Messrs. Page & Co. to the bank. On April 12 the bank handed the bill of lading to Messrs. Page & Co., with a letter in these terms :

“In consideration of your undertaking to deal with the merchandise in the manner hereinafter specified, we transfer to you as trustees for us the bill of lading, etc., for 1,628 tons phosphate rock, per Cyprus, which we now hold as security for payment of the advance specified at foot, and we request you to obtain delivery on our account of the merchandise referred to in such bill of lading and warehouse the same in our name, you paying the freight and expenses of discharge. We further authorise and empower you to enter into contracts for the sale of the merchandise on our behalf in the ordinary course of business, and we expressly direct you to pay the proceeds of all such sales from time to time to us immediately on receipt thereof."

That letter was received and acknowledged, and an undertaking was signed by Page & Co. to carry out the directions given in the letter. The transaction between the parties which gives rise to the controversy was thereupon complete. The bill of lading so received by Page & Co. was afterwards delivered by them, in implement of a contract of sale, to Cross & Co., and it is with respect to the price of the goods comprised in the bill of lading that the debt of Messrs. Cross arises.

I cannot help saying at the outset that, in my opinion, it is abundantly clear that the rights of Messrs. Page & Co. and the bank respectively must be determined, if the strictly legal course is to be followed, by the law of England. A transaction between a merchant in England and a bank in England, and the rights which arise out of that transaction, cannot, as it seems to me, fall to be determined by anything else but the law of England, just in the same way as, if this had been a transaction between a banker and a merchant in Glasgow, and the question had arisen in an English proceeding as to the rights that arose out of that transaction, it would have fallen to be determined according to the law of Scotland. But in the present case it appears that, there being a suggestion in the pleadings that the matter was one to be determined by the law of England, when the case came on for trial before the sheriff, those who maintained that proposition were not desirous of leading evidence as to what the law of England upon the point was. They were content to rest their case upon the law of Scotland, and have it decided as if the law of Scotland were applicable; or, perhaps, one may put it otherwise and say, as if there were no difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland.

That being so, I enter into no controversy whether it would have been open, in the present case, to this House to consider what the law of England was, and to determine the case according to the law of England. I am content to base my decision upon the conclusion at which I have arrived as to the law of Scotland. Of course, when I say that the rights arising out of this transaction between these parties would probably fall to be determined by the law of England, I do not for a moment intend to dispute that, where such a transaction has been entered into, there may be proceedings or transactions in Scotland as to which it would be necessary to have recourse to the law of Scotland to ascertain the rights which had arisen in respect of or arising out of the transactions relating to the contract which had its basis and origin in England. Those are considerations quite beside the present case, because it seems to me that, in the present case, there is nothing really which needs to be determined for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion in this action, except what was the real nature of the transaction at Liverpool between Messrs. Page & Co. and the North Western Bank. It appears that in the month of September of the previous year Messrs. Page & Co. had entered into an agreement to sell to Messrs. Cross & Co. several hundred tons of phosphate which were to be shipped between certain dates. It was not a sale of any specific goods; it was merely a contract to sell goods of a particular quality and quantity to be shipped at a particular time. When the bill of lading was handed to Messrs. Page & Co. on April 12, 1892, Messrs. Page & Co. transmitted that bill of lading to Messrs. Cross & Co. in implement of their contract with them. Upon their thus receiving the bill of lading in implement of the contract, that which down to that time had only been an agreement to sell became a sale, and Messrs. Cross became liable for the price of the goods so sold.

Was that or was it not a sale of the bank's goods? Was it a sale for or on behalf of the bank, or was it a sale of Page's goods in respect of which the bank

A could not claim to be principals? The only ground upon which the courts below have decided that it was a sale, not of the bank's goods, but of Page's goods, is that in order that a pledge may be effectual possession must continue in the pledgee; that parting with the possession is parting with his security and with any property which the pledge gives; that, even if the possession of the pledge may be parted with to a stranger so that the possession of the stranger should be still B the possession of the pledgee, that possession cannot be so parted with to the pledgor himself; and that if the pledgor receive back possession of the goods pledged, however clear it may be that he was to receive them only as the agent of the pledgee to do something with them on the pledgee's behalf, they were delivered for that purpose and received for that purpose. It is said that in those circumstances the law of Scotland inexorably requires that it shall be held that the C pledge is at an end, and that the entire property has reverted to the pledgor because he has regained possession of the goods which he had pledged.

I need hardly say that, if the law of England were applied, no such point would for a moment be arguable. There can be no doubt the pledgee might hand back to the pledgor as his agent for the purpose of sale, as was done in this case, the goods he had pledged, without in the slightest degree diminishing the full force D and effect of his security. But it is said that the law of Scotland is different; and the point upon which this case must turn cannot be more distinctly put than it was put in the judgment of LORD TRAYNER. He says :

“That a pledgee may part with the pledge temporarily for a necessary purpose, or for safe custody without the loss of this right, may be admitted, provided E he has not so parted with it to the owner. If he parts with it to a third party, the temporary possession of the latter is possession for the pledgee; he has no right in or to the subject except that which the pledgee gave him, and may at any time take away. But if the pledgee parts with the pledge to the owner the result is that the owner resumes possession of his own property freed from the security burden; the owner acquires no new right; but the pledgee's right, F as a real right, flies off, leaving him only his personal right against his debtor. This distinction between the delivery of the subject of pledge to a third party and to the owner is recognised in the passage in BELL'S COMMENTARIES which I have already cited.”

The question is whether that can be maintained as a proposition of the law of Scotland. Certainly there are cases where some rule of law defeats the object and G intention of the parties—where there is some technical rule which prevents effect being given to their intentions. The question is whether such a rule applicable to the present case has been shown to be established as part of the law of Scotland or not. I turn to the authorities upon which it is rested, because I confess that, with all respect, as a matter of principle I am unable to see why any such rule should exist. It does not seem to me to be a reasonable rule. If the rule exists, H it is one which runs counter to everyday commercial practice, and, I am satisfied, to the everyday commercial understanding of business transactions. Nevertheless, it may be that it is an established rule.

The only authorities cited are three. The first is in ERSKINE'S INSTITUTES, 3. 1. 33, where it is said :

I “In a pledge of moveables the creditor who quits the possession of the subject loses the real right he had upon it.”

As a general proposition, that may be perfectly true. It is to be observed that in the present case this is really something more than a pledge. In the paragraph from which I have quoted those words it is pointed out that a pledge gives a right of detention only of the goods, and gives no right to sell. Where, as in the present case, the delivery of the goods is accompanied by a grant of an absolute right of sale to the pledgee, he is certainly something more than an ordinary pledgee; he has a right which a mere pledge does not convey. But the general proposition that the parting with possession puts an end to the pledge is one with which I suppose no one would quarrel; but it does not touch the question with which your Lordships have to deal—namely, whether a delivery of possession for a particular purpose on the part of the pledgee to the pledgor is a parting with possession any more than a delivery under the same circumstances and for the same purpose to a third person. A

The next authority referred to is in BELL'S COMMENTARIES ON THE LAW OF SCOTLAND. He there alludes to the real right of a creditor being completed by delivery and continued by possession, which I suppose no one would doubt, and then occurs this discussion: B

“By the Roman law, it was lawful for the creditor, after the constitution of pledge by delivery, to restore the subject to the possession of the debtor on the footing of location, or any other legitimate contract. PAULUS lays down this doctrine very explicitly. But VOET very justly observes, in criticising this law, that to permit such practices were to endanger the safety of other creditors, and to sanction a fraud upon the rule which requires possession to complete a real right to movables; and that no true analogy can hold between the law of Rome, where hypothecs without possession were admitted, and the laws of modern commercial nations, in which the rule is established that possession presumes property.” C

He continues:

“It is true that, in the course of many contracts, there is a necessity for separating property and possession, and that the mere circumstance of goods being in the hands of another on a temporary contract will not deprive the real proprietor of his right in favour of the creditors of the temporary possessor.” E

That is stated generally; there is no exception made in the case of the person in whose hands the pledged goods are placed himself being the pledgor. He proceeds:

“And there seems to be no doubt that the right of a pledgee will also be sufficiently strong to support this temporary dereliction of possession, in the course of necessary operations on it; the manufacturer or other holder being custodier for the pledgee without injury to the real security. But the doctrine delivered by VOET is sound, where the possession is given up without necessity to the owner of the goods.” F

That is, confined to a case of possession being given up, without necessity, to the owner of the goods, and does not, and, as it seems to me, never was intended to, cover the case where possession is given to the person who happens to be the pledgor, just for the same legitimate purpose and in the same business manner as it might be given to any third person filling the same commercial capacity—that is to say, if it is given to a broker for sale or to a warehouseman to warehouse, or in other cases which might be put. There is nothing in that passage to warrant the conclusion that where the parties intended that to be, and it really was, the nature of the transaction, nevertheless their intention shall be held to be ineffectual because against their will the pledge or security is thereby destroyed. Where it is a pledge, as here, with the power of sale, I cannot think that anything I have yet read warrants the assertion that the delivery to the pledgor, who is a broker, for the purposes of sale would destroy all the rights of the pledgee. G

Beyond those general statements, which do not seem to me necessarily at all to cover or to touch this case, there is only one authority cited, and that is Tod & Son v. Merchant Banking Co. of London (1). That case would be open to review in your Lordships' House; but I confess, with all deference to the learned judges in the court below who took that view, I am unable to see that it governs the present case, or that it necessarily leads to the conclusion which the respondents seek to induce your Lordships to arrive at in the present case. The whole judgment here

A is based upon the proposition that delivery by the pledgee to the pledgor puts an end to the pledge. In Tod & Son v. Merchant Banking Co. of London (1) the bank, who were the pledgees, never did deliver at any time to any person to hold for them as their agent. The only deliveries which they ever made in that case were deliveries to a purchaser, who received the goods, not for the bank, but to hold from the moment of receipt as owner under the purchase. I confess I am at

B a loss to see how a case which deals with facts such as I have described can be held to be an authority for the proposition that the delivery of the goods by a pledgee to a pledgor as his agent puts an end to the pledge. In that case the bank were pledgees without any power to sell at all—they were mere pledgees. Messrs. Bryant and Ridley, who had pledged the goods, came to the bank, and obtained from the bank a promise that, if they sold the goods and obtained from

C the purchaser an obligation to pay the price to the bank, the bank would then be willing to deliver the goods to him. In the first instance, before the bank parted with the goods they obtained a direct undertaking from the purchaser of a portion of the pledged goods to pay them, and then they gave the order for the delivery of them to the purchaser.

In the second case, which was the transaction giving rise to the litigation in

D Tod & Son v. Merchant Banking Co. of London (1), the bank were content to make delivery of the goods without having got a direct undertaking on the part of the purchaser, but having obtained an undertaking by the pledgor that he would get such an undertaking. Having got that undertaking from the pledgor, they then made delivery of the goods. In that case it was impossible to say, or at all events it was very difficult (it is not necessary to go further) to say, that the pledgor in

E making those sales made them on behalf of the bank. He did not purport to do so; he made those sales on his own account as carrying on his own business. All that the bank did was to tell him that, if he should make such sales, and if he would get or give a certain undertaking, then they would be prepared to make delivery of the goods and take in place of the goods, which were their security, an undertaking from his purchaser or the undertaking which he promised to get from

F his purchaser. In that case the question which arises here did not arise, and could not arise, because the whole point of this case turns upon the fact that Messrs. Page & Co., in making this sale to Messrs. Cross & Co., were selling the goods of the North Western Bank by their direction and as their agents. Therefore, I am quite unable to see that Tod & Son v. Merchant Banking Co. of London (1) is any authority for the proposition upon which the decision of this case

G has proceeded.

It was argued at the Bar that this could not be said to be a sale by the bank of the bank's goods to Cross & Co., because Page's contract with Cross was of prior date to the bank's interest in the goods. But I apprehend that if an owner of goods (for this purpose it may be taken as precisely the same as if the bank had been absolute owners) places his goods for sale in the hands of an agent, and

H if that agent for the purpose of implementing an open contract which he has, delivers those goods to the person who has made that contract with him in such a way that upon delivery the sale becomes complete and the obligation to pay the price arises, that is just as much a sale of his principal's goods to that person, and just as much makes the purchaser liable to his principal and liable to be sued by his principal, as if he had had no contract before the goods were delivered,

I and had afterwards made the only contract that was ever made. I do not think that could be doubted for a moment in the English law; and I have heard no argument to suggest to me any substantial ground for holding that the law of Scotland is different in that respect. It seems to me, therefore, upon the whole that the right of the bank to these goods was continuous, that it was still effectual at the time of the delivery to Messrs. Cross & Co., that it was effectual at the time when this arrest of the price was made, and that a creditor of Page could not in Scotland any more than in England insist that that was a debt due from Cross to Page which he had a right to arrest as being a creditor of Page.

[His LORDSHIP dealt with two questions arising on the evidence which do not call for report, and concluded:] I move that the interlocutors of the sheriff and of the Court of Session appealed from be reversed, and the cause be remitted to the Court of Session to rank and prefer the appellants to the whole fund in medio, and to find the respondents liable to the appellants in their expenses of process in both courts below. The appellants, of course, will have their costs in this appeal.

LORD WATSON.—This appears to me to be a remarkably plain case. Concurring, as I do, in what has been said by the Lord Chancellor, I shall only make these very general observations. When a movable fund, situated in Scotland, admittedly belongs to one or other of two domiciled Englishmen, the question to which of them it belong is prima facie one to be determined by English law, and ought to be so treated by the courts of Scotland. In this case the respective rights of Page & Co. and the appellant bank depend on transactions which took place between them in England. I see no reason to doubt that, had there been any conflict between the law of Scotland and that of England upon the questions arising in this case, it would have been proper for your Lordships to consider and apply the law of England. But, according to my apprehension, there is no difference whatever between the law of the two countries applicable to the decision of this case. Upon the point of law which was mainly discussed in the courts below, and is disposed of by the last finding in the interlocutor appealed from, I have no hesitation in differing from the majority of the Second Division and concurring in the clear and satisfactory judgment of LORD YOUNG. The argument submitted for the respondents upon that point is, in my opinion, not borne out by the dicta of institutional writers to which they referred, and Tod & Son v. Merchant Banking Co. of London (1), upon which they also relied, if it has any bearing upon this case, is an authority the other way. I was somewhat impressed at the time by the argument of counsel for the respondents in regard to the respondents' alternative claim for £164 19s. 2d. But, assuming that the appellants may be liable to satisfy the claim, that circumstance can give the respondents no nexus upon the fund in medio, and they could not obtain any preference by an arrestment directed against Page & Co. In these circumstances I think the respondents must enforce their demand in a new action, and that this suit ought not to be prolonged by a remit to have it tried as a riding claim.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I concur.

Accrual of cause of action—Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708 (7 Anne, c. 12),
s. 3.*

By s. 3 of the Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708, a writ cannot be issued against the ambassador of a foreign State accredited to the Sovereign of this country while he is so accredited.

Held: (i) a writ at the suit of a creditor for the recovery of a debt could not be issued against such an ambassador during that time; nor (ii) after he had presented his letters of recall, during a reasonable period for which he remained in this country to wind-up and hand over to his successor his official business and to settle his own affairs; (iii) a writ could not be issued against an ambassador and renewed from six months to six months under R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1, because that order contemplated the case where there was a defendant capable of being sued, which an ambassador was not, and it would be the duty of the court to refuse an application for renewal of the writ when informed that it had been sued out against an ambassador; (iv) R.S.C., Ord. 11, which provided for service of a writ out of the jurisdiction did not impliedly repeal the Administration of Justice Act, 1705, s. 19, so as to prevent a plaintiff from bringing an action against a defendant after his return from beyond the seas within the time limited by the Limitation Act, 1623; and, therefore, time did not begin to run against the creditor until the former ambassador, or his personal representative after his death, returned to this country.

Notes. The Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3, and the Administration of Justice Act, 1705, s. 19, set out infra and referred to in the judgment, have, so far as material been replaced by s. 2 of the Limitation Act, 1939.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Divisional Court (WRIGHT and LAWRENCE, JJ.), upon a Special Case stated, before trial, under an order of the judge made by consent.

By the Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3 :

"... all actions of ... debt, grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty ... shall be commenced and sued within the time and limitation hereafter expressed and not after (that is to say) ... within six years next after the cause of such actions or suit, and not after. . . ."

By s. 19 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1705 (4 & 5 Anne, c. 16 (c. 3 in Revised Statutes)) :

"... if any person or persons against whom there ... shall be any cause of action of ... debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty ... be or shall be, at the time of any such cause of suit or action given or accrued ... come beyond the seas, that then such person or persons who is or shall be entitled to any such suit or action shall be at liberty to bring the said actions against such person or persons after their return from beyond the seas, so as they take the same after their return from beyond the seas within such times as are respectively limited for the bringing of the said actions before by this Act, and by the [Limitation Act, 1623]."

By s. 3 of the Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708 :

"... all writs and processes that shall at any time hereafter be sued forth or prosecuted, whereby the person of any ambassador, or other public minister of any foreign prince or State, authorised and received as such by Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, or the domestic, or domestic servant of any such ambassador, or other public minister, may be arrested or imprisoned, or his or their goods or chattels may be distrained, seized, or attached, shall be deemed and adjudged to be utterly null and void, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever."

May 28, 1894. The following judgments were read.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of my brothers LAWRENCE and WRIGHT, JJ., who held that the executor of Musurus Pacha could not set up the Statute of Limitations in answer to a claim made against him by Messrs. Gadban and Watson for money lent by them to his testator for nearly twenty years ago—viz., in the year 1873. Musurus Pacha for some thirty years prior to Dec. 7, 1885, on which day he presented his letters of recall, was ambassador in London accredited by the Sultan of Turkey to, and received by, Her Majesty as such. He left England two months afterwards—viz., in February, 1886, having been engaged during that interval in winding-up and handing over his official business and settling his own affairs. He then returned to Turkey, where he resided until his death in 1890, having appointed the plaintiff his executor. It must be

A taken for the purposes of this case that in the year 1873 Musurus Pacha, while ambassador in London, borrowed of Messrs Gadban and Watson, who were then trading in partnership, the sum of £3,107, and that this debt has never been repaid. After the death of Musurus Pacha, his executor, in the month of November, 1891, came to this country and engaged Mr. Gadban to collect certain bonds of the nominal value of £28,000 and other moneys belonging to the estate of his testator, and this action is brought, the writ being issued on Oct. 12, 1892, to recover from Mr. Gadban's executors these bonds and moneys which Mr. Gadban had collected in his lifetime pursuant to his agreement with the plaintiff. Mr. Gadban's executors do not dispute that they are in possession of these bonds and moneys, but they assert that they are, as against the plaintiff, who, as executor, is suing them in this country, entitled to be paid the £3,107 lent in 1873, which C is still unpaid, and the real point in this case is whether the recovery of this debt of Musurus Pacha is or is not barred by the statute of limitations.

It is true that the executors of Mr. Gadban, of whom Mr. Watson is one, have set up this claim by way of counterclaim dated Dec. 7, 1892, and counsel for the plaintiff raised a technical point whether this claim is the subject-matter of counterclaim, the action being against the executors of Mr. Gadban, and the counterclaim D being by Mr. Gadban's executors and Mr. Watson. [His LORDSHIP disposed of the point, which does not call for report, and continued:] It cannot be disputed, as this debt of £3,107 was contracted in this country in 1873, and as the present claim to be paid it (whether raised by counterclaim or independent cross-action is immaterial) was not raised till December, 1892, that prima facie the Statute of Limitations is an answer, for the six years would have run out in 1879; but this is E an exceptional case, and it is said that as Messrs. Gadban and Watson had no cause of action against Musurus Pacha, for the money lent in 1873, before he left this country in February, 1886—for until then he was not capable of being sued in the courts of this country, he being an ambassador thereto—and as since then he has continuously lived beyond seas, the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until his executor took proceedings in this country. Counsel for the plaintiff, F the executor of the ambassador, having strenuously urged the technical point raised in the amended Special Case, proceeded to minimise as best he could the recognised privileges and immunities of an ambassador accredited to this country. He did not assert, for this would have been useless, that Musurus Pacha could have been effectively sued during the period he was de facto ambassador in London, for Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (1), which has never been doubted, G settled that he could not, for during that period he was exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts of this country. He said, however, and in this I agree, that no case had actually decided that a writ could not be sued out against an ambassador if it were not served, and he asserted that this unserved writ, as I will call it, might have been sued out prior to 1879 by Messrs. Gadban and Watson and kept alive by renewal every six months under R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1, until Musurus Pacha H ceased to be ambassador and became a private gentleman in 1886, and that the Statute of Limitations began to run from the date when this unserved writ might have been sued out, which constituted a cause of action which was long prior to six years before the making of the present claim.

He also argued, if wrong as to this, that Musurus Pacha could have been effectively sued to judgment by suing out and serving a writ upon him during the I two months between Dec. 7, 1885, and February, 1886, while he was making ready to leave this country, and that a cause of action arose then which was also more than six years prior to the present claim. Lastly, he said, even if wrong upon both these points and no cause of action arose until after Musurus Pacha had left this country in February, 1886, a cause of action arose then, for Musurus Pacha after his return to Turkey might have been sued by Messrs. Gadban and Watson by means of the procedure which permits notice of a writ to be served upon a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction for breach of a contract to be performed within it (Ord. 11), and that the cause of action, therefore, arose in February, 1886, which was more than six years before the present claim, so that whichever way it was taken, he said, a cause of action had arisen to Messrs. Gadban and Watson more than six years before they set up their claim to the £3,107 in 1892, and, therefore, it was statute barred. A

There are three statutes applicable to this case—the Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3, which enacts that all actions shall be commenced and sued within six years after the cause of action, and not after, with an exception in s. 7, that plaintiffs, if beyond the seas, may bring such actions within six years after their return; the Administration of Justice Act, 1705, s. 19, which enacts that, if a defendant is beyond seas at the time of the accrual of the causes of action, the plaintiff shall be at liberty to bring such action within six years after the defendant's return from beyond seas; and, lastly, the Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708, which by s. 3 declares B C

“that all writs and processes that shall at any time hereafter be sued forth or prosecuted, whereby the person of any ambassador . . . authorised and received as such by Her Majesty, her heirs or successors . . . may be arrested and imprisoned, or his . . . goods or chattels may be distrained, seized, or attached, shall be deemed and adjudged to be utterly null and void to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever.” D

The writs and processes mentioned in the Act are not confined to such as directly touch the person or goods of an ambassador, but extend to such as in their usual consequences would have this effect, as was held in Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (1). That case renders it unnecessary to resort to text writers and other cases prior thereto, for it lays down in clear and unambiguous language the principles upon which an ambassador is free from being impleaded in the courts of this country. LORD CAMPBELL, in delivering the considered judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, which consisted of himself, WIGHTMAN, ERLE and CROMPTON, JJ., used this language (2 E. & E. at p. 111): E

“[An ambassador] does not owe even temporary allegiance to the Sovereign to whom he is accredited, and he has at least as great privileges from suits as the Sovereign whom he represents. He is not even supposed to live within the territory of the Sovereign to whom he is accredited, and if he has done nothing to forfeit or to waive his privilege, he is for all judicial purposes supposed still to be in his own country.” F

These being the principles upon which an ambassador is independent of the civil jurisdiction of the country to which he is sent, in my judgment, it is clearly inconsistent with them to hold that an ambassador who has at least as great privileges from suits as the Sovereign whom he represents, can, even apart from the Act of 1705, have a writ sued out against him commanding him in the name of Her Majesty to appear in her courts to answer the claim of one of her subjects, even although such writ is not to be served. Moreover, what jurisdiction is there to sue out a writ in the form of a writ for service in this country against a Turk resident in Turkey, or to serve such a writ upon a Turk in Turkey? And yet this was and is the true legal position of Musurus Pacha from the date he first became ambassador in London till he died in Turkey, in 1890. If, however, such a writ were sued out, in my judgment, it could not be renewed from six months to six months as proposed in this case, for such a renewal is only to be had “when the court or judge is satisfied that reasonable efforts have been made to serve the defendant, or for other good reasons”: R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1. This order clearly contemplates the case where there is a defendant capable of being sued and served when the writ is issued, but who cannot be found, or there is some other good reason for the renewal of such a writ, and it does not apply to a case like the present, where there is no such defendant at all when the writ is sued out. In my opinion, when the court or judge ascertained that the writ which they or he were asked to renew had been sued out against an G H I

A ambassador at the time accredited to this country, their duty would be to refuse the application for renewal, and to hold that the writ, as in my judgment it was, had been improvidently issued. I am aware that it may be said that this view would work a hardship upon a creditor of an ambassador, for he would be unable to prevent the Statute of Limitations from running while the ambassador is accredited to this country, and, therefore, there would be "good reason" for granting the renewal; but, in my opinion, the true answer is given by LORD CAMPBELL in the Magdalena Co. Case (1) (2 E. & E. at p. 115) that

B "Those who cannot safely trust to the honour of an ambassador in supplying him with what he wants, may refuse to deal with him without a surety who may be sued, and recourse is always open of making a complaint to the government by which the ambassador is accredited."

C For these reasons, in my judgment, it is not competent either to sue out a writ, even though it is not to be served, or to renew it against an ambassador, and that, therefore, Messrs. Gadban and Watson had no cause of action against Musurus Pacha prior to Dec. 7, 1885, when he presented his letters of recall. But there is another ground which is also fatal to this contention of the plaintiff's. It has been held that as, on the one hand, there cannot be a cause of action within the meaning of the Limitation Act, 1623, from which the six years will commence to run, unless there be a person in existence capable of suing: Murray v. East India Co. (2); so, on the other hand, there can be no such cause of action until there is somebody who can be sued: Douglas v. Forrest (3). BEST, C.J., said (4 Bing. at p. 704):

E "Cause of action is the right to prosecute an action with effect; no one has a complete cause of action until there is somebody that he can sue."

As Messrs. Gadban and Watson had no such person—at any rate, down to Dec. 7, 1885, the statute had not commenced to run before that date. As to the second point—viz., that Messrs. Gadban and Watson had an effective cause of action against Musurus Pacha during the two months between December, 1885, and February, 1886—in my judgment, it was decided in Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (1) that this is not so. It was there held that there could be no execution against an ambassador while he is accredited, nor even when he is recalled, if he only remains a reasonable time in this country after his recall, and that is precisely what Musurus Pacha did in the present case. During those two months Musurus Pacha was in the same position as he was in before his recall, as to immunity from being sued. It has been said that this was obiter. I do not think so; but, even if it be, in my judgment, considering the position of an ambassador, it is good law and sound sense. This point, therefore, fails the plaintiff.

G I now come to consider the last point. It cannot, I think, be doubted that the Queen's Bench Division correctly held that the s. 19 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1705, which suspended the running of the Statute of Limitations if the cause of action accrued while the defendant was beyond seas till he returned, is an enactment passed in favour of plaintiffs, as, indeed, is s. 7 of the Limitation Act, 1623, though now restricted by s. 10 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. It is, in my judgment, impossible to hold that a rule of practice and procedure, which R.S.C., Ord. 11, is, repeals the provisions of a statute. By s. 19 of the Act of 1705, plaintiffs in the position of Messrs. Gadban and Watson are to have six years in which, after their debtor's return from beyond seas, to prosecute their claims. If Ord. 11 is to be read as repealing the statute, in my judgment, it must at the same time be held to be ultra vires; but the truth is that this order does nothing of the kind. It gives the court or a judge in its or his discretion power to allow service of a writ of summons or notice of a writ out of the jurisdiction in certain specified cases, but this rule in no way conflicts with the statute, which enacts that, if a cause of action accrues against a person beyond seas, the plaintiff shall have six years within which to bring his action after the defendant's return. The rule has nothing whatever to do with the privilege conferred by s. 19 A of the Act of 1705 upon plaintiffs. In Wilding v. Bean (4), the court were not dealing with a case like the present, and the dictum of the Master of the Rolls, reported in 64 L.T. 41, does not appear in the LAW REPORTS, but, even if it did, it is not applicable to the present case. For these reasons the last point also fails the plaintiff. The Queen's Bench Division were, in my judgment, right when they held that the plaintiff could not set up the Statute of Limitations to the claim of B Messrs. Gadban and Watson, and this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

DAYEY, L.J., stated the facts, dealt with the technical preliminary point, and continued: The question of substance which has been argued before us is whether the debt claimed by the plaintiff in this action is barred by the statute. The question is a curious one, and of some general interest. Not the least singular feature C is, that it is the representative of the ambassador who wishes to limit and minimise the privilege. Counsel for the plaintiff contends: (i) that to issue a writ without serving it, would have been no breach of the ambassador's privilege, and, therefore, a writ might have been issued for the purpose of saving the statute, and renewed from time to time; (ii) that, at any rate during the two months or more that D Musurus Pacha remained in this country after his recall, the writ might have been issued and served; (iii) that after his return to Turkey the writ might have been served on him abroad under R.S.C., Ord. 11, and therefore, the statute began to run from at least that time, or (in other words), that Ord. 11 has had the effect of repealing the provisions of s. 19 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1705.

I am against the plaintiff's argument on each of these contentions. With regard to the first, it is in my opinion sufficient to refer to s. 3 of the Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708, which is in these terms: E

"... all writs and processes that shall at any time hereafter be sued forth or prosecuted, whereby the person of any ambassador, or other public minister of any foreign prince or State, authorised and received as such by Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, or the domestic, or domestic servant of any such ambassador, or other public minister, may be arrested or imprisoned, or his or their goods or chattels may be distrained, seized, or attached, shall be deemed and adjudged to be utterly null and void, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever." F

It has been decided in Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (1), that this section applies not only to writs of execution against the property or person of a privileged person, but also to writs which lead up to, and would in ordinary course have the consequence of, attaching his goods or person. If so, I am of opinion G that a writ of summons in an action is of that character, and that the effect of the statute (which is said to be declaratory only of the common law), is to make such a writ void and of no effect. Counsel for the plaintiff is quite right in saying that the writ had been served in Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (1), H and that all that it was necessary to decide was that the service was bad. But the grounds upon which the decision was based in LORD CAMPBELL's judgment go beyond that point, and, in my opinion, show a total want of jurisdiction of the court to entertain the action at all. LORD CAMPBELL thus states the principle (2 E. & E. at p. 111):

"He is to be left at liberty to devote himself body and soul to the business I of his embassy. He does not owe even a temporary allegiance to the Sovereign to whom he is accredited, and he has at least as great privileges from suits as the Sovereign whom he represents. He is not even supposed to live within the territory of the Sovereign to whom he is accredited, and if he has done nothing to forfeit or to waive his privilege, he is for all judicial purposes, supposed still to be in his own country. For these reasons, the rule laid down by all jurists of authority who have written upon the subject is, that an ambas-

- A sador is exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts of the country in which he resides as ambassador. . . . It certainly has not hitherto been expressly decided that a public minister, duly accredited to the Queen by a foreign State, is privileged from all liability to be sued here in civil actions; but we think that this follows from well-established principles."
- B The passage quoted, in my opinion, correctly states the legal principles on which the exemption is founded, and is in accordance with the course of decision in our courts: see the latest case of The Parlement Belge (5) in the Court of Appeal, in which it was said that, as a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority, and of the international comity which induces every sovereign State to respect the independence of every other sovereign State, each State declines to exercise by means of any of its courts any of its territorial jurisdiction
- C over the person of any Sovereign or ambassador, or over the public property of any State which is destined to its public use, or over the property of any ambassador, though such Sovereign, ambassador, or property be within its territory. I am unable to think that the issue of a writ in an action, which action the court has no jurisdiction to entertain, and which writ, therefore, the court has no jurisdiction to issue, can prevent the statute running. I agree with, and will not
- D repeat, what has been said by my learned brother on the practical difficulty of supposing that the leave of the court would be given to the renewal of such a writ. I am, therefore, of opinion that Gadban and Watson, or Gadban or his executors, could not have issued a writ properly against Musurus Pacha, or (in other words) had no right of action against him while he was ambassador. The doubts suggested in Taylor v. Best (6) cannot, in my opinion, be supported.
- E The answer to the plaintiff's point that the writ might have been served on Musurus Pacha while he was still in this country is given by WRIGHT, J., and, in addition to the authority cited by him, I may refer to LORD CAMPBELL's judgment in Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (1), in which he says (2 E. & E., p. 114):
- F "There can be no execution upon the writ while the ambassador is accredited, nor even when he is recalled if he only remains a reasonable time in this country."
- Paragraph 2 of the reply avers that,
- G "Musurus Pacha remained in England only for the purpose of making the necessary preparations for his departure, and no longer than was necessary for the purpose."
- Nothing to the contrary is stated in the Special Case, and there is nothing from which we can infer that he stayed longer than a reasonable time. I am, therefore, of opinion that the privilege continued until his return to Turkey, and it appears to me it would be almost an outrage on common sense to say that the privilege
- H ceased the moment he had presented his letter of recall. In handing over the affairs of the embassy to his successor the ex-ambassador is still engaged in his Sovereign's business, and must have a reasonable time allowed for that purpose.
- The last point taken by counsel for the plaintiff is one of some novelty, and, if I may be permitted to say so, of some boldness. In the first place R.S.C., Ord. 11, does not purport to repeal the statutes of limitation or any of them, or
- I say anything about them. If repeal there be, therefore, it is not by express words, but must be implied from the inconsistency of the provisions of the Order with the provisions of the statute in question. This must, in order to effect a repeal, be a necessary implication. I do not see any necessity in the case. Order 11 provides a means by which litigants may in certain cases, with the leave of the court, serve a writ upon a defendant out of the jurisdiction. The Administration of Justice Act, 1705, in effect provides that the statute of limitations shall not run in favour of a defendant who is beyond the seas. Where is the inconsistency? A plaintiff has the alternative right. He may either apply for leave to serve the writ abroad, or he may wait till his defendant comes within the jurisdiction. I ought, however, to add that I should hesitate some time before I expressed any opinion that the judges, under a power to make rules relating to the practice and procedure of the courts, can repeal statutes of limitation, although they are, no doubt, part of the lex fori. Could they, for example, say that the time for recovery of debts shall be five years instead of six? It is unnecessary, however, to say more about this as, in my opinion, the point does not arise. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

In the administration of justice, whether by a recognised legal court or by persons who, although not a legal public court, are acting in the same sort of capacity, public policy requires that, in order that there may be no doubt as to the purity of the administration, any person who takes part in it shall not be in such a position that he might reasonably be suspected of being biased. The question is not whether he was or was not biased, nor is it whether he may be suspected by some perversely-minded person. The question is whether he bears such a relation to the matter which is being adjudicated that he can reasonably be suspected of being biased. If he can, the proceedings of the tribunal in which he has taken part will be invalidated.

Medical Practitioner—Infamous conduct—Act with respect to profession regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable by professional brethren of good repute and competency.

By s. 29 of the Medical Act, 1858 [which has been re-enacted in almost identical terms by s. 33 (1) of the Medical Act, 1956]: "If any registered medical practitioner . . . shall after due inquiry be judged by the General [Medical] Council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional respect, the General Council may, if they think fit, direct the registrar to erase the name of such medical practitioner from the register."

If it be shown that a medical man, in the pursuit of his profession, has done something with respect to it, i.e., with regard either to his patients or to his professional brethren, which would be reasonably regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable by his professional brethren of good repute and competency, it is open to the General Medical Council to say that he has been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect." The question is not whether what a medical man has done would be an infamous thing for anybody else to do, but whether it is infamous for a medical man to do it, for an

H Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of HENN COLLINS, J., at the trial of the action by him without a jury.

The plaintiff was a medical practitioner, and, the defendants, the General Medical Council, having ordered his name to be erased from the register which is kept by them under the Medical Act, 1858, he brought this action claiming an injunction to restrain the council from keeping his name erased and a mandatory injunction ordering them to put his name back in the register. In May, 1892, the council gave the plaintiff notice to appear before them and answer a complaint made against him that he had been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect," within the meaning of s. 29 of the Medical Act, 1858, which provided:

"If any registered medical practitioner shall be convicted in England or Ireland of any felony or misdemeanour, or in Scotland of any crime or offence, or shall after due inquiry be judged by the General Council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional respect, the General Council may, if they think fit, direct the registrar to erase the name of such medical practitioner from the register."

Two grounds of complaint were brought forward. One was advertisements which the plaintiff had been publishing for some time in a newspaper in which he made serious accusations against all medical men, except himself, and against many of the methods of medical science generally followed by the medical profession, and also held himself out as the one person to whom people in ill-health should come for relief. These advertisements, it was alleged, were published with the view of increasing his medical practice and obtaining fees. The other ground of complaint referred to a book on vaccination which the plaintiff had published. This book met with great disapproval among the medical profession, and the plaintiff had promised to withdraw it from circulation. In fact, however, his interest in the book passed from him to the Anti-Vaccination Society, and it was said that the plaintiff continued afterwards to advise his patients to go to the Anti-Vaccination Society and indirectly promoted the sale of the book.

The complaints against the plaintiff were laid before the defendant council by the committee of the Medical Defence Union, a society of medical men, one object of which was the protection of the honour of the medical profession. A Dr. Phillipson had been for some time a subscribing member of this society, and was also a vice-president, and as such was an ex officio member of its committee. On May 3, 1892, he was elected a member of the defendant council, and he thereupon sent in to the Defence Union a resignation of his membership. By the rules of the Defence Union a resignation of membership was not complete until the lapse of two months from the day when it was sent in. On May 28 he attended a meeting of the defendant council, at which the complaints against the plaintiff, which were brought by the committee of the Defence Union, came on for hearing. After due inquiry the council judged the plaintiff to have been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect," and directed the registrar to erase the plaintiff's name from the register. Dr. Phillipson had not attended any meeting of the committee of the Defence Union at which complaints against the plaintiff were discussed, and until May 28, when the defendant council heard the case against the plaintiff, he had no personal knowledge whatever of the complaints made against the plaintiff.

When the present case came before HENN COLLINS, J., it was contended that, Dr. Phillipson, being a member of the committee of the Defence Union and a member of the body who tried the plaintiff's case, was in the position of both judge and accuser, and his position rendered the decision of the council wholly void, for public policy required not only that persons acting judicially should in fact be free from any bias or prejudice, but also that they should be free from any suspicion of bias. It was also contended that there was no evidence of any "infamous conduct in a professional respect" on the part of the plaintiff. HENN COLLINS, J., gave judgment for the defendant council, and the plaintiff appealed.

Coleridge, Q.C., and Schultess Young for the plaintiff.

Reid, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie for the council.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the grounds of the plaintiff's claim are two. The first is, that Dr. Phillipson, one of the members of the defendant council who adjudicated upon the plaintiff's case, was disqualified from so acting, so that the decision of the council was rendered not only illegal but void. The second ground is that there was no evidence upon which the council could reasonably find that the plaintiff had been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect." It is admitted that, if the plaintiff can make good either of these two objections, the decision of the council is illegal and void, and in either case, I presume, the plaintiff would be entitled to the relief which he asks for.

The first question, then, is this: Was Dr. Phillipson in such a position as to

- A make his participation in the decision of the council illegal as being against public policy? If he was in such a position, then the decision of the council was rendered wholly void. It is said that he was incapacitated from taking part in the decision because he was, or might be, biased. That he had any pecuniary interest in the matter is not suggested, but it is suggested that he might have had a bias. We are bound to act according to the decision of this court in Leeson v. General Medical Council (1). It may be that some of us (of whom I am not one) would have preferred that that case should have been decided according to the view which was taken by Fry, L.J., but, as we are now bound by that decision, all we have to do with regard to it is to discover rightly what it did decide and whether it embraces the present case. It seems to me that, in that case, the majority of the court decided that where a person who has taken part in a judicial proceeding, or, in other words, has sat in judgment on a case, has any monetary interest in the result, however small, the court will not inquire further whether he was really biased or in any way likely to be biased. The court will say at once that it is against public policy. But Leeson's Case (1) also decides that a person who is to sit as a judge may have other relations to the matter under consideration which may incapacitate him from acting as a judge, as to which it may be a crucial question whether he was in substance and in fact incapacitated by bias from sitting as a judge.

- The question then is one of substance and of fact in each particular case. What is the fact to be decided? If his relation to the matter which is the subject of the judicial proceeding is such that he can by no possibility be biased, it seems clear that there is no objection to his acting as judge. The question is not whether in fact he was or was not biased. The court cannot inquire into that. But there is something between those two propositions. In the administration of justice, whether by a recognised legal court or by persons who, although not a legal public court, are acting in the same sort of capacity, public policy requires that, in order that there may be no doubt as to the purity of the administration, any person who takes part in it shall not be in such a position that he might be suspected of being biased. In R. v. Allan (2), MELLOR, J., said (4 B. & S. at p. 926):

"It is highly desirable that justice should be administered by persons who cannot be suspected of improper motives."

- If those words be taken literally I think that they are rather too large, because I know of no case in which a man cannot be suspected. There are some persons whose minds are so perverse that they suspect other people without any ground whatever. The question of incapacity is to be one of substance and of fact, and, therefore, as it seems to me, the man's position must be such that, in substance and in fact he cannot be suspected. The question is not whether he may not be suspected by some perversely-minded person, but whether he bears such a relation to the matter that he cannot reasonably be suspected of being biased. I think that, for the sake of the character of the administration of justice, we ought to go as far as that, but we ought not to go any further. That I take to be the rule for the application of the test laid down in Leeson's Case (1).

- Turning now to the present case, could Dr. Phillipson be reasonably or substantially suspected of bias? The question depends in each case upon the relation of the judge who is impugned to the matters which he has had to adjudicate upon. The relation of Dr. Phillipson to that matter in this case was as follows. He had been a subscriber to and member of a society called the Medical Defence Union, a society formed for the defence of the honour of the medical profession, to protect that honour against the improper conduct of any individual member of the profession. He had been a vice-president of the society, and was in consequence an ex officio member of the committee to which was entrusted an authority to complain before the defendant council of improper conduct by any medical man. He was only an ex officio member of the committee, and in fact never acted as a member of it. Moreover, before the plaintiff's case came on for hearing by the defendant council he had resigned his membership of the Defence Union, so that when the plaintiff's case was heard, he was not only not a subscriber to the Defence Union, but was not a vice-president nor a member of the committee. A

Under these circumstances, it seems to me impossible that any reasonable person should think him biased, or that substantially and really he could be liable to be even suspected of bias. There is nothing upon which to found the suspicion. The first objection, therefore, taken to his decision fails. As to the second ground, it is admitted that, if there was no evidence upon which the council might fairly and reasonably say that the plaintiff had been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect, they went beyond the jurisdiction given them by the Medical Act, 1858, in entertaining or adjudicating upon the case. If there was no such evidence they ought to have refused to interfere. Was there any evidence of misconduct by this plaintiff that justified the defendant council in finding him guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect?" I am prepared to adopt this statement of one ground of guilt which has been drawn up by my brother LOPES. It is this. If it be shown that a medical man, in the pursuit of his profession, has done something with respect to it which would be reasonably regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable by his professional brethren of good repute and competency, then it is open to the General Medical Council to say that he has been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect." The question is not merely whether what a medical man has done would be an infamous thing for anybody else to do, but whether it is infamous for a medical man to do it. An act done by a medical man may be infamous though it would not be infamous if done by anybody else, but to bring such an act within s. 29 of the Medical Act, 1858, it must also be shown to have been infamous "in a professional respect." There may be some acts which, although not infamous if done by any other person, yet if done by a medical man in relation to his profession, that is, with regard either to his patients or to his professional brethren, may be fairly considered as "infamous conduct in a professional respect." Such acts would, I think, come within s. 29. B C D E

I adopt that statement of my brother LOPES as a good definition of at least one state of circumstances in which the General Medical Council would be justified in finding a medical man guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect." F Was there any evidence in the present case of any such conduct by the plaintiff? It seems to me that this question must be solved thus. Taking the evidence before the defendant council as a whole, did it bring the plaintiff within the definition I have read? Was the evidence, taken as a whole, reasonably capable of being treated by the council as bringing the plaintiff within that definition of "infamous conduct in a professional respect?" I cannot doubt that it was. It seems to me that it may be fairly said that the plaintiff endeavoured to defame his brother practitioners, and to induce suffering people, by means of his defamation, to avoid going to them for advice, and to come to himself, in order that he might obtain the remuneration or fees which otherwise he would not obtain. If, on the whole, his conduct could reasonably be construed as amounting to that, it seems to me to come within the definition, and the defendant council were justified in saying that the plaintiff had been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect." G H I think it could be, and, therefore, the plaintiff's second ground of appeal fails, and in my opinion the judgment of HENN COLLINS, J., was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. That an accuser must not be a judge is in accordance with public policy and natural justice, and is a principle too well established to require any comment. A person who has a pecuniary interest in the result of an accusation cannot adjudicate on it. The inference at once arises that he is interested. But where there is no pecuniary interest nor any suggestion of pecuniary interest, it is, to use the words of BOWEN, L.J., in Leeson's Case (1), "a question of substance and of fact whether one of the judges has in truth also been an accuser." Again adopting the words of BOWEN, L.J.: "Has the judge

A whose impartiality is impugned taken any part whatever in the prosecution either by himself or by his agents." And in the same case, which was very similar to the present one, the General Medical Council and the Medical Defence Union both being concerned in it, COTTON, L.J., said (43 Ch.D. at p. 381):

B "Then as regards the question whether they are to be considered as complainants here, we ought to look to substance and not, because this complaint is brought by the council in the name of the union, to say that a person, a member of the union, who has nothing to do, or can have nothing to do, with bringing forward this complaint, is to be treated as a prosecutor, or as one of the persons who are bringing forward this complaint."

C Those words are very applicable to the present case, and the conclusion which I draw from that case is, that in such a case as the present the proper question to be asked is whether there is any reasonable, any real and substantial, ground for suspecting bias.

Let me apply that to this case. Was there any reasonable ground in substance and in fact for suspecting any bias in Dr. Phillipson? He was a subscriber to the Medical Defence Union. He had been a vice-president, and as such he was D an ex officio member of the committee, the body which on behalf of the union instituted complaints such as that against the plaintiff. Dr. Phillipson never acted upon that committee, and at the time when this inquiry took place he had resigned his membership of the union. It was contended that his resignation did not take effect, or was not complete, for a period of two months after he had sent it in, but I think that in effect he had resigned his membership. It must also be recollected that the evidence shows that he had never heard of the plaintiff's case E before the inquiry. In these circumstances I think that HENN COLLINS, J., was quite right in coming to the conclusion that there was no reasonable ground in substance or in fact for suspecting any bias in Dr. Phillipson. If that is so, the first objection relied on by the plaintiff fails.

Then I come to the other question as to the meaning of the expression "infamous conduct in a professional respect," contained in s. 29 of the Medical Act, 1858. I think that, if there was any evidence on which the council could reasonably have come to the conclusion which they did come to, their decision is final. If, on the other hand, there was no evidence upon which they could reasonably arrive at that conclusion, then their decision can be considered by this court, and reversed if it is thought necessary. It is important first to consider what is meant by G "infamous conduct in a professional respect." My Lord has adopted a definition which with his assistance and that of my brother DAVEY I had prepared. I do not for a moment imagine that that is an exhaustive definition, but I think it is one which is strictly and properly applicable to the present case. Assuming it to be a sufficiently good definition for the purpose of the present case, was there any evidence before the General Medical Council which justified them in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff had been guilty of infamous conduct in his H profession within that definition? It appears to me that there was abundant evidence upon which they might find as they did. In addition to the publications in the newspaper there was the plaintiff's conduct with regard to his pamphlet on vaccination. His conduct in that matter appears to me to come distinctly within the definition I have given. In 1887 or 1888 he published a pamphlet against I vaccination which met with great disapproval, and he promised to withdraw it, and, so far as he was concerned, it appears that he did withdraw it from circulation. But it had passed from his hands into those of the Anti-Vaccination Society, and, well knowing that, he advised his patients to consult that society, being perfectly aware that the advice they would get from the society would be to adopt a method of effacing the effects of vaccination. In fact, he was indirectly advising those who consulted him to violate the law which the legislature has thought desirable for enforcing vaccination. [Note.—The provision in s. 16 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, that the parent of a child or other person having its custody should procure the vaccination of the child within the prescribed period A was repealed by s. 26 of the National Health Service Act, 1946.]

On both these grounds I think there was ample evidence to justify the council in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff was guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect."

DAVEY, L.J.—Nothing can be more important than to maintain intact the B principle that a man shall not be judge in his own cause, and to preserve every tribunal which has to adjudicate upon the rights or status or property of any of Her Majesty's subjects from any suspicion of partiality. Speaking for myself, if I were at liberty to discuss the judgments which were delivered by the lords justices in Leeson's Case (1), I confess that my mind would go rather with the judgment of FRY, L.J. He appears to me to state a general principle, easy of C application to the circumstances of any particular case, whereas I find a difficulty in extracting from the judgments of COTTON and BOWEN, L.JJ., the exact principle to be applied. Their judgments also seem to me to leave too much to the inferences to be drawn from the circumstances of each particular case. The true rule to be applied seems to me to be one which ought to be above and beyond the circumstances of any particular case, whether the facts suggest bias or not. The D true rule, I think, was that laid down by MELLOR, J., in R. v. Allan (2), to which my Lord has already referred. But we are bound by the judgments of the majority of the court in Leeson's Case (1), and I adopt them in the sense in which they have just been explained by the Master of the Rolls and LOPES, L.J.

Applying to the best of my power the principle which is to be evolved from those judgments, I am of opinion that there is no ground for holding that Dr. E Phillipson was disqualified from taking part in the decision of the present case.
I must add that, even if I were to adopt the judgment of FRY, L.J., or the words of MELLOR, J., in their most extreme application, I should come to the same conclusion that Dr. Phillipson was not disqualified. What are the facts of the present case? Dr. Phillipson was a vice-president of the Medical Defence Union, and as such he was, according to the constitution of the society, a member of their com- F mittee, but he did not attend any of the meetings of the committee, and it appears that he was not even aware of the plaintiff's prosecution before the defendants until he had taken his seat as a member of the defendant council. That shows that he was not a party or privy to what has been called the plaintiff's prosecution.
Still he might be held to be disqualified if members of the committee of the union were as such disqualified. But there is a fact to which I attach much more im- G portance than was apparently attached by HENN COLLINS, J., viz., Dr. Phillipson's resignation. The inquiry by the defendant council was held on May 28. On the previous May 3, Dr. Phillipson had ceased, so far as lay in his power, to be a member of the union, and, that being so, the mere fact that under the rules of the society two months must elapse before a resignation is complete, does not seem to me to be of any consequence. It would, I think, be a straining at a gnat H to hold that under these circumstances a rule which the society chose to adopt disqualified Dr. Phillipson from taking any part in the decision of the plaintiff's case.

On the second point I agree that there was sufficient evidence upon which the defendant council might reasonably and properly infer that the plaintiff was endeavouring to discredit and defame the medical profession generally, and to shake the confidence of the public in other medical men, with a view to his own profit and pecuniary advantage. The question is not whether the plaintiff is I right or wrong in his views on the subject of medicine and hygiene. He may be right, notwithstanding his differences from the majority of his professional brethren. He may be in the position of athanasius contra mundum. But there are different modes of stating one's opinions and views, and a man may be actuated by different motives in enforcing his views and opinions on the world. In the present case the language in which the plaintiff has thought fit to express his views, and the circumstances, and the surroundings with which his advertisements

- A were issued, coupled with the notices to which our attention has been drawn, recommending his own works and his own advice, seem to me, when taken together, to be evidence from which the medical council might reasonably hold that his conduct was "infamous in a professional respect." I adopt the definition which has been drawn up by LOPES, L.J., and approved by the Master of the Rolls as being at any rate a test and a standard by which those words may be defined.
- B There is also the plaintiff's conduct with regard to the leaflet on vaccination, after he had undertaken not to publish it. I repeat, in order that there may be no mistake about it, that I do not think the observation to be well founded that upon the evidence before the council they must be taken to have condemned the plaintiff on the ground of his peculiar opinions on the subject of medicine and hygiene. We have not got to say whether the council were right or wrong in the
- C inference which they drew. All that we have to decide on this point is whether there was evidence on which they might, as reasonable men, have come to the conclusion which they did come to, and in my opinion there was.

Re ENGLISH, SCOTTISH AND AUSTRALIAN CHARTERED BANK

- F [Reported [1893] 3 Ch. 385; 62 L.J.Ch. 825; 69 L.T. 268; 42 W.R. 4; 9 T.L.R. 581; 37 Sol. Jo. 648; 2 R. 574]

Company—Scheme of arrangement—Duty of court—Duty to protect minority from coercion and see that statutory meeting was duly convened and that scheme reasonable.

- G By s. 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, the court was given power, subject to certain conditions, to sanction a compromise or an arrangement proposed between a company and its creditors or any class of its creditors. If sanction were given, the arrangement or compromise became binding on all the creditors or the particular class of creditors.

- H Held: the duty of the court was not merely to ascertain that the statutory conditions had been fulfilled and then sanction the arrangement: the court must be satisfied that the statutory majority which were to bind the dissentient minority had acted bona fide and that the dissentient minority were not unduly coerced; that the various classes of creditors had been properly consulted; that the meeting at which the arrangement was agreed on was properly convened; and that the arrangement contemplated was reasonable having regard to the circumstances of the case and one of which a business man would, in those circumstances, reasonably approve: the court must also examine the scheme lest there be some defect hitherto unobserved, and consider any possible alternative scheme: at the same time, if the creditors in accepting the arrangement had acted honestly and on sufficient information, with time to consider what they were about, they were better judges than the court of what was to their commercial advantage, and the court should be slow to differ from them in the absence of some great oversight or mis-carriage.

Appeal by depositors in the English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered Bank against a decision by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., on a petition presented by the official receiver and liquidator in the winding-up of the bank, for the sanction of the court to a scheme under the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, for the reconstruction of the bank. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady for creditors who supported the scheme. Latham, Q.C., and Howard Wright for the official receiver.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order made by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., which has not been drawn up and laid before us in the ordinary way, but the nature of which may be shortly stated to be the approval provisionally of a scheme for reconstructing the English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered Bank. I say provisionally because, in the absence of the formal order, I must be guided by what I see in VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.'s judgment. F

The depositors who have appealed are creditors of the bank to the extent of £92,000. They are mainly Scottish companies who have advanced by way of deposit to this bank. The bank itself is a chartered bank. It is not registered under the Companies Acts. It has a nominal capital of a million and a half. It has £900,000 paid up, and there is a reserve liability to the same amount. It stopped payment on April 12, 1893. A petition to wind it up was presented on April 13, and on April 26 an order was made and a provisional liquidator was appointed. On May 18 an order was made for meetings to be held. The constitution of the bank is important. The bulk of the shareholders are English people. They are not Australians; and that is a matter which strikes me as extremely important in considering some of the objections which have been made to the votes of the Australian creditors. It has been represented that they have been induced by the feelings of patriotism and a desire to support this bank and to reconstruct it and make it a strong bank. That observation would have twice the force it has if those people were shareholders. But they are not; they are creditors. The liabilities of this bank are stated very succinctly in the table which is contained in the petition. The main liabilities are on the deposit and current accounts which come to close upon five millions. The assets are set down on the other side, and the main assets—the assets which have to be got in somehow in order to pay these liabilities—are represented as bills receivable, loans and advances against securities, £5,300,000. G

Everything depends upon the realisation of those assets. The bank is represented to be solvent. The table which is before me shows it, and it shows further H

A that there is a very considerable margin on paper of excess of assets over liabilities, and that, if the assets could be realised, there would be enough, and more than enough, to pay 20s. in the pound. Further, the affidavits show that, if these assets could be realised, I do not say now, but if times got better and the assets were realised, and the creditors could wait, they might get their money in the long run. But the state of things is very anomalous in Australia. It is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that this is not the only bank that has stopped payment. There are a great many others, and the consequence is that it is impossible at this present moment to realise these assets at anything like 20s. in the pound. The assets consist of loans made on land, sheep farms, and what not. There is such an enormous quantity of that kind of property on the market, and there are so few purchasers of that kind of property, that, if these properties are brought on the market rapid realisation is utterly hopeless.

In considering this or any other scheme for paying creditors less than 20s. in the pound, it is absolutely necessary not only to look at the scheme but to look at the other side. Where is the money to come from? We start with this, that the creditors ought to be paid 20s. in the pound. There is no question about that, in this country at all events. If sufficient money is in existence for them to have 20s. in the pound, they ought to have it at the expense of the shareholders. If they cannot get it, it becomes necessary to decide upon some alternative scheme for giving them less than that to which they are entitled. I have come to a conclusion concerning the evidence upon two or three points which I think are perfectly plain. The first point is this. It is agreed on all hands that anything like sudden realisation—anything like a forced sale—would be utterly ruinous to the creditors. They would have so large a loss that any different scheme—any alternative scheme—would reasonably appear better than that to the great bulk of them. I think the evidence also shows that time may be usefully gained in one way only and that is by keeping the bank going somehow. If you cannot keep the bank going that alternative scheme of terminable payments will fall through. Having arrived at that, there comes the various modes of keeping the bank going. The scheme before us is one of them. Whether it is the best one is another matter altogether, but I do not think it is just to say that this is a mere scheme to resuscitate the bank and not pay the creditors. If I thought that that was the object of the scheme, I should negative it without the slightest hesitation. But I think the true view of it is that it is a scheme for paying the creditors by resuscitating the bank, and I do not believe the creditors can get paid in any other way. That is the result, to my mind, from the perusal and study of this evidence.

Having arrived at that conclusion, I shall say no more about the so-called patriotism of the Australians. I dare say they are patriotic, but they are creditors, and nothing else. They are not shareholders. They have no more to do with the bank than I have. They care nothing about it except for the purpose of getting their money out of it. And although they take different views from the Scottish creditors, and may be influenced, for anything I know, by a desire to keep the bank going, yet their main object of keeping the bank going is to get their money. Beyond that there is no reason to suppose that they care anything about the bank.

That being the broad conclusion from the facts, I come now to consider the objections which have been made to this scheme, and to consider the function of the court. The scheme has been carried by an enormous majority of creditors if they are all accounted for; but that is not enough. By s. 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870:

“Where any compromise or arrangement shall be proposed between a company which is, at the time of the passing of this Act or afterwards, in the course of being wound-up, either voluntarily or by or under the supervision of the court, under the Companies Act, 1862 and 1867, or either of them, and the creditors of such company, or any class of such creditors, it shall be lawful for the court, in addition to any other of its powers, on the application in a summary way of any creditor or the liquidator, to order that a meeting of such creditors or class of creditors shall be summoned in such manner as the court shall direct; and if a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of such creditors or class of creditors present either in person or by proxy at such meeting shall agree to any arrangement or compromise shall, if sanctioned by an order of the court, be binding on all such creditors or class of creditors, as the case may be, and also on the liquidator and contributories of the said company."

The duty of the court in acting upon that section has been discussed and explained more than once, and I do not know that I can usefully add anything to what I said, and to what BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., said, in Re Alabama, New Orleans, Texas and Pacific Junction Rail. Co. (1). I adhere to what I said there, and I will read a short passage from my judgment ([1891] 1 Ch. at pp. 238, 239):

"What the court has to do is to see, first of all, that the provisions of that statute have been complied with; and, secondly, that the majority has been acting bona fide. The court also has to see that the minority is not being overridden by a majority having interests of its own clashing with those of the minority whom they seek to coerce. Further than that, the court has to look at the scheme and see whether it is one as to which persons acting honestly, and viewing the scheme laid before them in the interests of those whom they represent, take a view which can be reasonably taken by business men. The court must look at the scheme, and see whether the Act has been complied with, whether the majority are acting bona fide and whether they are coercing the minority in order to promote interests adverse to those of the class whom they purport to represent; and then see whether the scheme is a reasonable one, or whether there is any reasonable objection to it, or such an objection to it as that any reasonable man might say that he could not approve of it."

FRY, L.J., said something to the same effect in somewhat different language. He said (ibid. at p. 247):

"Under what circumstances is the court to sanction a resolution which has been passed approving of a compromise or arrangement? I shall not attempt to define what elements may enter into the consideration of the court beyond this, that I do not doubt for a moment that the court is bound to ascertain that all the conditions required by the statute have been complied with; it is bound to be satisfied that the proposition was made in good faith; and, further, it must be satisfied that the proposal was at least so far fair and reasonable as that an intelligent and honest man, who is a member of that class, and acting alone in respect of his interest as such a member, might approve of it. What other circumstances the court may take into consideration I will not attempt to forecast."

It is quite obvious from the language of the Act and from the mode in which it has been interpreted that the court does not simply register the resolution come to by the creditors, or the shareholders, as the case may be. If the creditors are acting on sufficient information and with time to consider what they are about and are acting honestly, they are, I apprehend, much better judges of what is to their commercial advantage than the court can be. I do not say it is conclusive, because there might be some blot in a scheme which had passed unobserved and which might be pointed out later. But giving them the opportunity of observation, I repeat that I think they are much better judges of a commercial matter than any court, however constituted, can be. While, therefore, I protest that we are not to register their decisions, but to see that they have been properly convened and have been properly consulted, and have considered the matter from a proper point of view—that is, with a view to the interests of the class to

A which they belong, and that which they are empowered to bind—the court ought to be slow to differ from them. It should do so unhesitatingly if there is anything wrong about it. But it ought not to do so, in my judgment, unless something is brought to the attention of the court to show that there has been some great oversight or miscarriage.

B With these observations, I pass on to consider what the objections made to this scheme are. First of all, I will take the objections, which I will refer to as technical, that is to say, the objections relating to the proxies. I have read from the statute words which show that there must be three-fourths of the creditors present in person or by proxy. “Proxy” there means by some agent properly appointed. In this case the Australian creditors were present by the person whom they had in fact appointed. He was there. They were, therefore, present not in person, but by proxy. Then comes the difficulty that the proxy papers—the authority authorising their agent to appear and vote for them—were not in this country. That difficulty was foreseen and was provided for by that part of C VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.’s order convening the meeting. The position of affairs is peculiar. This bank had main offices in various places in Australia—Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, and one or two other places. They had also depositors, the D great bulk of whom were Australians, who had to be consulted as to how the scheme was to be carried out. Time was important, and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in the order convening the meeting directed that the service by post of a circular letter with form of proxy and copy scheme should be deemed to be good service as if the same had been posted and sent in the ordinary course of post seven days before the day appointed for the meeting.

E Then there follows a special provision which is quite novel—I do not think any of us have seen it before—and which is extremely ingenious. The question is whether the learned judge exceeded his powers by putting it in. It was ordered that the creditors and contributories should be at liberty to vote at the meeting personally or by proxy, and that the creditors and contributories in Australia F should be at liberty to give proxies to persons to be designated for the purpose by the official receiver for or against the scheme, or to any other persons entitled to vote at the meeting whom they might think proper, provided that such proxies were deposited at the offices of the company in Melbourne or Sydney not later than three days prior to the holding of the meetings in London, and that particulars of the proxies so deposited should be communicated by telegram to the official receiver for use at the meeting. That, I repeat, is an entirely new form of order. G I need hardly say that it is adapted to the necessities of the occasion. It is ingeniously using the improved methods of communication by telegraph which it would be folly to shut out and not to use if it can be done.

H The question is whether the learned judge had power to make any such order as that. That turns upon the powers conferred upon him by the statute under which he convenes meetings. The most important provision with reference to this particular point will be found in s. 91 of the Companies Act, 1862, which has to be read coupled with s. 2 of the Act of 1870 to which I have already referred. Section 91 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides :

I “The court may, as to all matters relating to the winding-up, have regard to the wishes of the creditors or contributories, as proved to it by any sufficient evidence, and may, if it thinks it expedient, direct meetings of the creditors or contributories to be summoned, held, and conducted in such manner as the court directs, for the purpose of ascertaining their wishes, and may appoint a person to act as chairman of any such meeting, and to report the result of such meeting to the court: In the case of creditors, regard is to be had to the value of the debts due to each creditor, and in the case of contributories to the number of votes conferred on each contributory by the regulations of the company.”

Section 2 of the Act of 1870 enables the court

"in addition to any other of its powers, on the application in a summary way of any creditor or the liquidator, to order that a meeting of such creditors, or class of creditors shall be summoned in such manner as the court shall direct."

The section goes on to deal with the question about the majority. It appears to me that, under the authority of s. 91 of the Act of 1862, this novel form of order is not beyond the powers of the judge. It appears to me that he had power to direct that these proxies should be filled up in Australia; that they should be deposited in the offices which are mentioned; and that the result of the proceedings might be acted upon in this country, even before the proxy papers came over. I think it was within his power to do it; and being within his power to do it, I do not hesitate to say it is a power with which we should not think of interfering. That is what was done. Therefore, so far as that somewhat important point is concerned it appears to me that there was nothing irregular in the proceedings at this meeting.

[His LORDSHIP then dealt with a point under the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 80, which no longer calls for report owing to the repeal of that section by the Finance Act, 1949, and the exemption from stamp duty of letters or powers of attorney for appointing or authorising a proxy to vote at a company meeting.]

D

I pass on now to consider the real substance of this matter. It is urged before us that the scheme was one which ought not to be forced on dissentient creditors. I have already read the statutory provisions, and explained the function of the court in seeing that a dissentient minority are not unduly coerced. One must look now at this scheme, and, as I have already said, one must bear in mind the alternative. Bearing in mind the alternative to which I have alluded, can we say that this scheme is one which creditors cannot reasonably think to be to their advantage, and the advantage of those who belong to the same class as themselves? That depends upon the scheme itself. Looking at the scheme, one sees objections to it. If I were a creditor I should see objections to it. I do not say I should not vote for it; probably I should. But that is neither here nor there. Every creditor who does not get his due may have objections to the scheme if he can in any other way get it; but if he cannot get it, it is another thing. The scheme is, first, that there should be debenture stock bearing interest at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum, in sums of £10 and upwards, to an amount equal to one-fourth of the total amount owing by the old bank in respect of the terminable deposits, current accounts, or other liabilities not thereafter specifically provided for. The nature of that debenture stock is apparent from papers which are laid before me. It does not mean debentures which are charged upon assets. The expression "debenture stock" is ambiguous. We all know that sometimes it merely means a certificate for a debt owing by an incorporated company and secured by the instrument under seal. Sometimes it means more than that. Sometimes it means a mortgage, if not on specific lands at all events on what is called "The undertaking." That is another form of debenture stock. There is no ambiguity about what is meant here. The papers show it. It is merely an acknowledgment of indebtedness that the holder is entitled—subject to a provision to which I will refer presently—to a certain sum of £10 bearing interest at 4 per cent. As far as I have gone at present, that debenture stock does not constitute a debt for which an action at law would lie, because there is no time fixed for payment.

I

Secondly, it is proposed that terminable deposit receipts payable by five equal annual instalments commencing in the seventh year from the date of the incorporation of the new bank for a further fourth of the liabilities are to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, and at the option of the holders are to be convertible at par into debenture stock as above at any time before Jan. 1, 1898, on such extended time as the new bank shall permit. There you get the introduction

A of the terminable feature. These things are not like debenture stock. They are to be payable at certain specified times, namely, by equal annual instalments commencing in the seventh year from the date of the incorporation of the new bank.

The third proposal is that there should be inscribed deposit stock for the remaining half of the liabilities of the old bank entitled to cumulative interest at the rate of £4 10s. per cent. per annum payable only out of the profits of each year. The holders of the inscribed deposit stock are only to be paid out of the profits, and they are to be paid, before the shareholders, but after other people and after creditors. The only other clause I will refer to at present is cl. 6, which provides that interest shall be payable on the debenture stock and terminable deposit receipts on Jan. 1 and July 1 of each year. On default of payment of interest for six months or on a winding-up the principal of the debenture stock and such receipts is to mature. So that on the happening of these events even the money represented by the debenture stock would become a debt clearly payable and enforceable. The principal of the inscribed deposit stock is to mature on winding-up, but, save as aforesaid, the debenture stock and the inscribed deposit stock is to be perpetual.

Those are the main features. The objections to them are manifest enough.

D They are converting the creditors to a certain extent into annuitants, and they are postponing their payment to an extent to which a creditor objects. But still, we must face the alternative. It is by facing the alternative that one is led to sanction the scheme. It appears to me, I confess, after what took place in Australia when this scheme was laid before the creditors that it is impossible for us to say that this matter was not fairly and fully brought before the attention of the creditors. It was for them to decide, and they have decided in favour of this scheme. Why? Because they see plainly enough that unless they have this scheme they will be in great danger of being in a very much worse plight than they will be if they accept it. I can understand a great corporation saying: "We would rather face our loss; we have got £92,000 in this out of about two and a half millions, but though £92,000 is not a sum to be sneezed at, we want to know where we are, and we would rather put up with the loss; we will get it if we can get it, and bear the loss if we cannot." The great bulk of the depositors are not in so happy a position. They say: "We would rather not insist on facing the loss, which means ruin to us; we would much rather give time for this scheme, which appears to us sincerely and honestly framed in our interests."

I do not hesitate to say that, forming the best judgment I can of this scheme, it has been honestly framed in the interests of the creditors, and, giving the Australian creditors all their due for patriotism, I fail to see that they have sacrificed their interests as creditors to any patriotism for the colony or love for the bank. I have already observed that they have not got one farthing interest in the bank except as paymasters. They see plainly enough that in the condition of affairs in the colony they cannot get their money unless they adopt some such scheme as this. It is said they have not had an opportunity of considering all sorts of other schemes. I do not think that is necessary. If you lay before creditors a scheme which they think is sufficient, I do not think it is the province of the court to say that every possible and conceivable scheme which the ingenuity of man can suggest was not laid before them and submitted to them. They are business men. They have looked at it; they know their own interests, and they have approved the scheme by a vast majority in favour of it. It appears to me that the learned judge was perfectly right; that this scheme ought to be confirmed; and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—Two objections are taken to this scheme. The first is an objection to it on the merits. The second is a more technical objection, namely, that it has not been approved of by the statutory number of creditors. It would be quite true to remark that if the English creditors alone were considered they might have said that. But if the Australian creditors are counted as well as the English there is no doubt the scheme would be carried by an overwhelming majority. A

What is contended is that the votes of the Australians ought not to be counted, having regard to the mode in which those votes were obtained. The scheme of arrangement is a scheme under s. 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, and the material part of the section is this:

"...if a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of such B creditors, or class of creditors, present either in person or by proxy at such meeting, shall agree to any arrangement or compromise, such arrangement or compromise shall, if sanctioned by an order of the court, be binding on all such creditors, or class of creditors, as the case may be, and also on the liquidator and contributories of the said company."

This enables a majority of creditors—provided that there is a proper statutable C number—to bind the dissentient minority.

The mode in which this power is to be exercised has, to my mind, been very well and correctly laid down in the Alabama Co.'s Case (1), which has already been referred to. What I understand to be decided by that case is that it is not sufficient for the court to ascertain that the statutory conditions have been com- D plied with. The court must go further than that and be satisfied that the statutory majority which are to bind the dissentient minority have acted bona fide, that they have not acted adversely to those whom they professed to represent; and lastly, that the arrangement contemplated is a reasonable arrangement such as that which a man of business would reasonably approve. With regard to the word "reasonably," it must always be borne in mind that the word "reasonably" is a relative term. It means reasonably with regard to the particular circumstances E of the case. What is reasonable in one case might be unreasonable in another.
What is unreasonable in the abstract might be reasonable in the particular circumstances. The reasonableness must be always regarded with reference to other alternatives. For instance, take an arrangement giving a very small benefit to creditors. If the alternative were absolute ruin to the company and no benefit to the creditors, I should think that the original arrangement would be reasonable. F

In the present case, I do not doubt for a moment that the maintaining of the bank as a strong bank, and in the interests of the community in Australia has to some extent influenced the votes of the Australian creditors, but I have come to the conclusion that the dominant idea of these Australian creditors has been the preservation of the assets of the bank for the benefit of themselves and all the creditors, because, as has been already observed by LINDLEY, L.J., and it is G a matter not to be forgotten, the creditors are Australian and the shareholders are English. Having regard to the state of things in Australia, according to the evidence before us, it seems to me impossible at the present time to realise the assets of the company except at a ruinous sacrifice. Other banks are failing all round; there are very large overdrafts due to this bank, and I have not the slightest doubt to the other banks. Anything like a realisation of these overdrafts or calling H them in would compel very large sales of sheep stations, and sheep stations would become a drug in the market. The result would be either that sheep stations would be absolutely unsaleable, or, if sold, they would be sold at prices ruinously below their real value. Putting it very shortly, it seems to me that the evidence clearly establishes that.

What is the other view—the view put forward if this arrangement is sanctioned? I
It is said—and I cannot myself help thinking that there is a good deal in this—that the goodwill of the bank, which is a very valuable security, may be maintained.
We have been told, and there is evidence to that effect, that the government have promised to continue to remain a customer of the bank. We have also been told that such is the confidence in the successful resuscitation of this bank that large sums amounting to half a million have at the present time been deposited in trust with this bank. All this makes it, to my mind, perfectly clear that anything like liquidation would be out of the question. Then it is said, and it was strongly

A urged by counsel for the appellant depositors that "even assuming that, why not adopt the course which seems to have been adopted by other banks, and let there be a moratorium or something of that kind—something short of the scheme, something that would not make the creditors annuitants, and would not postpone their claims to new creditors of the bank—something short of that of which we highly disapprove." I answer that suggestion in this way. I say that, for anything I
B know, this is a better scheme than the schemes of these other banks. I am very much influenced by this. The Australian creditors almost unanimously approve of this scheme. Who can better know the state of things in Australia than these Australian creditors. They are there upon the spot; they know all the details connected with the bank; they know all the circumstances which are likely to make the bank a flourishing concern, or the contrary. And it appears to me that
C none of us—nobody in this country or anywhere else except in Australia—can express a view so cogent with regard to this matter as these Australian creditors. It does not stop there, because we have also a strong body of expert evidence obtained from stockbrokers in this country to the effect that they highly approve of the scheme. They believe, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, that it is a scheme which would be most likely to end in a benefit to the creditors
D at large.

In these circumstances, I am unable to say that this scheme is unreasonable. I think that the learned judge has come to a very proper conclusion in sanctioning this scheme. I will refer to the other objections. With regard to the votes, although it is said that these Australian votes ought not to be counted, the first question raised is whether the judge had any power to make the order he did.
E No doubt, it is a new form of order, and I take it that it is an order which would only be made in very exceptional circumstances, such as the present. It appears to me, when you refer to s. 91 of the Companies Act, 1862, that it clearly authorises that which the learned judge has done. It is also to be borne in mind that the Act of 1870, under which this scheme is sanctioned, incorporates the Act of 1862. The words are that it is to be read and construed as part of that Act. The
F words of s. 91 of the Act of 1862 are these: [His LORDSHIP read the section] That appears to me to confer upon the learned judge power to do precisely that which he has done in these circumstances, so that what he has done is a proper and desirable thing having regard to the circumstances. The object being to ascertain the wishes of the creditors both in England and elsewhere it is a matter upon which I do not think anybody can have any doubt. I come to the conclusion that this
G appeal must be dismissed with costs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I wish to add a few remarks upon a point which, for the first time, arises in this case, that is, whether or not the electric telegraph can be brought into play to carry out what was eminently needed, and indeed was absolutely necessary to carry out, justice in this case. In my judgment, this
H depends in the main upon what power VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., had in this winding-up matter, because it must be admitted that he has not had before him the best evidence of these instruments of proxy, as I will call them. What are the powers given to the learned judge in winding-up matters? I turn to s. 91 of the Companies Act, 1862, and there is a phrase there which to me is very significant. It says this:

I "The court may, as to all matters relating to the winding-up, have regard to the wishes of the creditors or contributories, as proved to it by any sufficient evidence."

That last phrase is put in for the purpose of enlarging the power of the judge who has to adjudicate in these winding-up matters. It clearly abrogates the necessity of his acting upon strict legal evidence. It also clearly allows him to act upon secondary evidence if he thinks fit. When he desires to ascertain what are the wishes of the creditors, he may act upon any evidence which he thinks sufficient for the purpose of arriving at the truth with regard to their wishes. That I apprehend to be the true meaning of the words "upon any sufficient evidence." We have next to turn to the section of the Act which provides how and in what way it is to be ascertained whether three-fourths in value of the creditors agree to the proposed scheme. That brings me to the Act of 1870, under s. 2 of which the majority must be present "either in person or by proxy at such meeting." It will be noted that it is not stated "by an instrument of proxy." In other sections of the Companies Acts you will find a distinction drawn between an instrument of proxy and a proxy itself. It seems to me to be manifest that reading that line in this section "either in person or by proxy" means either in person or by his lawfully constituted agent, and not by the instrument of proxy or the proxy paper. Suppose these Australians, by a duly-signed instrument of proxy, and a duly deposited instrument of proxy under Table A, if that applies here, had delegated the authority to a Mr. Smith to go to this meeting in London and vote for the Australian creditors, where is there anything to say that Mr. Smith must show an instrument of proxy to satisfy the meeting or the court afterwards that he is the duly authorised agent of the Australians? Counsel for the appellants depositories was asked that, and he was unable to point to any statute that says it is necessary for the agent to have the instrument of proxy with him. It seems to me that it is not necessary in this case, where a judge has to decide whether the votes are to be counted or not, because he may act as regards entertaining the wishes of the creditors upon any evidence which is sufficient to him. Mr. Smith comes and Mr. Smith says to him: "I can assure you upon oath that I have these proxies, and that they are deposited in Melbourne." Why will not that do, I ask? Supposing there had been a letter written from Melbourne, why should not the letter be accepted if the judge has no reason to doubt it, and considers it sufficient? A telegram is sent; the judge has no reason to doubt it, and believes it. Why should not he act upon it? Has he authority to act upon it? It seems to me he has, and that is the answer to all the legal argument about not being able to count these Australian votes as matter of law. It was to meet those points that this order of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., was made. He was in a difficulty about time; everybody was in a difficulty about time. In my judgment, he had jurisdiction to make the order which he did. Therefore, as a matter of law, if the judge considered the evidence sufficient, and if there was no reason to doubt the truthfulness of it, as VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., had not, in my judgment, these votes were countable, and should not have been rejected.

Therefore it seems to me that both the points of law which were raised about these Australian votes not being counted fail. With regard to the judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., I agree with him in the main, but I must say I think he was hypercritical in the remarks he made regarding the judgment of this court delivered by LINDLEY, BOWEN, and FRY, L.JJ., in the Alabama Co.'s Case (1). I declare that I cannot conceive anything clearer than the judgments of the lords justices in that case. I agree with what has fallen from LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., as to the law which ought to be applied to this case, and I think that VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., with a willing mind could have applied the law to this case perfectly easily. I am not going to question whether this scheme on the facts ought to be sanctioned or not. I agree with what has fallen from the lords justices who have preceded me. I think that this appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

A judgment debtor deposited a sum of money with his solicitors for a purpose which failed. The judgment creditor issued a garnishee summons against the solicitors to attach the debt, which they refused to pay on the ground that, having a bill of costs against the judgment debtor to an amount larger than the deposit, they could successfully set up a counterclaim in any action which he might bring against them for its recovery. Upon an issue being directed to determine whether the solicitors were indebted to the judgment debtor,

Held: there was a debt due from the solicitors to the judgment debtor which the judgment creditor would attach for the following reasons: (i) as the money had been entrusted for a particular purpose which had failed, a resulting trust to hand it back to the debtor was imposed on the solicitors who had no lien on it; (ii) before the Judicature Acts the solicitors would have been entitled to any right of set-off, and those Acts had not altered the rights of the parties to an action in the matter of set-off; and (iii) those Acts had not altered the rights of the parties by allowing a counterclaim, as that was nothing more than a change in procedure, a counterclaim by a defendant with no set-off being for all purposes except execution an independent action, and, if both parties were successful, each would get judgment for the full amount.

Appeal by the plaintiff, a judgment creditor of the estate of Colonel Betty, from a decision of A. L. SMITH, J., on an issue holding that there was no debt due from the defendants, Messrs. Campbell & Co., solicitors, to the estate of Colonel Betty which the plaintiff was entitled to attach. B

The issue was directed by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., to try whether on Oct. 2, 1890, the defendants, Messrs. Campbell & Co., were indebted to the estate of Colonel Betty, deceased, in the amount of £133 16s., or any part thereof. It was proved that on Oct. 2, 1890, Messrs. Campbell & Co. had in hand the sum of £121 2s. 2d., being part of the sum of £500 handed by the late Colonel Betty to them for the purpose hereinafter mentioned; and it was also proved that at that date Colonel Betty's estate owed Messrs. Campbell and Co. £121 2s. 2d. for law costs. Prior to Oct. 4, 1889, the plaintiff in this issue had recovered a judgment against Colonel Betty for the sum of £1,600, and had also taken proceedings against him in bankruptcy. In this month negotiations were commenced between the defendants acting as the solicitors for Colonel Betty and Messrs. Crump & Sons, acting as solicitors for the plaintiff, as to the way in which this judgment could be satisfied, and thereupon a proposal was made by the defendants, acting for the colonel, that he should pay down £500 and give a bill for the balance of the £1,600 at six months, to be renewed from time to time upon certain suggested conditions. This proposal was being entertained by Messrs. Crump & Sons, the solicitors of the plaintiff, when, upon Nov. 23, 1889, Colonel Betty died. Prior to the colonel's death, namely, on Nov. 19, 1889, he sent to the defendants, and they received from him the sum of £500 for the specific purpose of being applied towards the part payment of the judgment for £1,600 when the negotiations then in progress were completed. Upon the colonel's death the plaintiff demanded of the defendants this £500, which they then had in hand. They refused to hand it over to him, and he thereupon, on Dec. 3, 1889, commenced an action against them to recover it as being money had and received to his use. This action was subsequently discontinued, the plaintiff being advised that he could not support an action for money had and received by the defendant to his use, inasmuch as the terms upon which the judgment was to be settled had not been agreed upon. On Oct. 2, 1890, the plaintiff being still execution creditor of Colonel Betty for the £1,600, issued a garnishee summons against the present defendants, alleging that they were debtors of his judgment debtor. An order nisi was obtained, but it was subsequently discharged by the master, and on appeal to VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., the present issue was directed. C D E F G

A. L. SMITH, J., held that there was no debt due from the defendants to the estate of Colonel Betty which the plaintiff was entitled to attach. The plaintiff appealed. H

Phipson for the plaintiff.

Muir Mackenzie (R. T. Reid, Q.C., with him) for the defendants.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case an issue has been ordered to try whether the defendants were indebted to the estate of Colonel Betty, deceased, at the time of an application for a garnishee order. A. L. SMITH, J., held that they were not; and, though I always hesitate to differ from him, I cannot agree in the judgment he has given. I

The defendants are solicitors, and some money was entrusted to them for a particular purpose, so that it was accompanied by a trust, and they could not have kept it to satisfy their claims, whatever those claims might be. They were bound to employ it for the specific purpose for which it was entrusted to them, or else to return it. That purpose failed, and the consequence was that a resulting trust

A was immediately imposed on them, namely, to hand the money back. Being trustees they had no lien against their cestui que trust; that is admitted, and the decision in Brandao v. Barnett (1) compels the defendants to make that admission.

Nor would a plea of set-off have been available before the Judicature Acts; judgment for the full amount would have been given for the plaintiff in an action to recover the money. If there had been a right of set-off, and it had been pleaded, only one judgment would have been given, that is to say, judgment would have been given for the difference between the sums. Before the Judicature Acts, then, if the defendants' present claim had existed, yet the plaintiff would have recovered judgment for the whole amount of the money. The Judicature Acts have not altered the rights of the parties to an action in the matter of set-off, though they have given a defendant a right to make a counterclaim. A counterclaim may be treated as a set-off if it is in fact a set-off; and if a defendant who has a set-off calls it a counterclaim, he is not bound by his wrong use of a name. If a defendant has no set-off, then his counterclaim is in the nature of a cross-action. This court has often said that such a counterclaim is, for all purposes except execution, an independent action. If both parties are successful in their claims each gets a judgment for the full amount, whereas in the case of set-off there would be one judgment for the difference between the two claims. A counterclaim is in all respects, for instance in taxation of costs, an independent action, except in the matter of execution.

In Westacott v. Bevan (2), WILLS, J., has said that this court has held that it is only for the purpose of taxation of costs that two separate judgments are given; but that is a misinterpretation of what this court has said. Execution is issued as formerly in the case of cross-actions, not upon the goods of both plaintiff and defendant, but in favour of him who has obtained judgment for the larger amount, for the difference between the two judgments. The same remark applies to the costs of the claim and counterclaim; where they are taxed the allocatur is for the difference between them. Therefore, the view taken in that case by WILLS and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, JJ., of what this court has said, is not correct.

F The consequence of what I have said is that, as the Judicature Acts have not altered the rights of the parties, the debt owing from the defendants to the executors still exists in spite of the counterclaim, and the judgment creditor is, therefore, entitled to a garnishee order attaching the debt. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

G LOPES, L.J.—The issue directed in this case was to inquire whether the defendants were indebted to the estate of Colonel Betty, deceased, in a sum which the plaintiff, a judgment creditor of Colonel Betty, might attach; and A. L. SMITH, J., has held, that the money placed by Colonel Betty in the defendants' hands cannot be attached. The money was placed in their hands for a specific purpose which failed upon the death of the depositor. His executors thereupon became entitled to have the money returned to them at once, and could have maintained an action for money had and received.

H But it is said that the defendants had a claim against Colonel Betty in respect of a bill of costs which exceeded the amount deposited with them, and which they might have set up as a counterclaim against the executors if an action had been brought by them for a return of the deposit. It was admitted by counsel for the defendants, as he was compelled to do by Brandao v. Barnett (1), that the defendants could not have relied on a lien, and that a set-off was not available, because the money was deposited for a special purpose. He also admitted that a cross-action before the Judicature Acts would have been no defence, but he said that a counterclaim, which can now be set up by a defendant, is on a different footing. The Judicature Acts were not intended, by allowing a counterclaim, to alter the rights of parties. A defendant is permitted to set up a counterclaim as a matter of practical convenience; but it is nothing more than a change in procedure, and does not give him any right that he had not before. Consequently, the defendants' claim for costs does not affect the plaintiff's right to attach the debt which they owe to Colonel Betty's executors, and this appeal must be allowed. A

KAY, L.J.—With all respect I also dissent entirely from the judgment of A. L. SMITH, J. Money was deposited with the defendants for a specific purpose which failed, and the plaintiff is now attempting to attach it in execution for a judgment debt owing to him by the depositor. A. L. SMITH, J., held that the defendants were not indebted to the depositor, and for this reason: it was admitted that the defendants had no right of lien or set-off, but he held, that nevertheless they might have counterclaimed for the costs due to them from Colonel Betty if his executors had sued for a return of the deposit; and as the costs due to them exceeded the amount of the deposit, he held that the defendants were not indebted to Colonel Betty or his executors. Try that by the simplest possible test. Supposing the defendants' claim was for a liquidated amount which could not be used as a set-off, can it possibly be said that they could, nevertheless, by bringing a cross-action acquire that right? This clearly cannot be. B

Then it is said that the Judicature Acts have given a right which did not exist before by allowing a counterclaim. All that has been done by allowing a counterclaim is to enable a cross-action to be brought and tried at the same time as the original action. It is impossible to say that the rights of the parties have been altered by this, it is allowed only for convenience, and to save a separate action being brought, with all the attendant cost of doing so. The Judicature Acts have not assisted the defendants at all in this case. If a depositor is in possession of money which he is bound to restore to the depositor, and in respect of which, he cannot rely upon any lien nor by reason of the nature of the deposit claim a right of set-off for a greater sum which is owing to him, still less can he rely on a right to counterclaim which he may have. The judgment creditor can, therefore, attach this sum of money, and with all deference to the learned judge, I think this appeal must be allowed. C

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Salary of bankrupt—Agreement with employer to deduct part of salary in return for payment of debts—Payment of alimony under order of Divorce Court—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), s. 53 (2).

The bankrupt, an actor, was earning a sum of £30 a week under an agreement in writing with a theatrical manager by which he agreed to act for a period of two years, and the manager agreed to pay him £22 10s. a week while acting in London and £30 a week while acting in the provinces, subject to a proportionate deduction for every night on which the theatre was not open, or the actor was unable or unwilling to act. A receiving order having been made against the actor, he entered into an arrangement with the manager under which the manager bought up his debts and deducted £20 a week from his earnings. The bankrupt was also paying £4 a week as alimony under an order of the Divorce Court. On an application by the trustee in bankruptcy, an order was made under s. 53 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that the bankrupt should pay £15 a week to the trustee.

Held: the payments to the bankrupt were either "salary" or "income" within the meaning of s. 53 (2) of the Act of 1883, but, the arrangement with the manager being valid, he was not "in the receipt of a salary or income" of £30 a week, but only of one of £6 a week, and no order ought to be made.

Notes. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has been repealed. For s. 53 (2), see now the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 51 (2).

Appeal by the bankrupt against an order of Mr. Registrar LINKLATER, that the sum of £15 a week, part of the bankrupt's salary of £30 a week, should be paid by weekly instalments to the trustee in his bankruptcy, to be applied in payment of the bankrupt's debts.

The bankrupt was an actor, and, on June 4, 1891, he entered into an agreement in writing with Sir Augustus Harris, manager of a theatre, by which he was engaged to act at that theatre or elsewhere for two years, at a salary of £22 10s. a week when acting in London, and of £30 a week when acting in the provinces.

Payment was to be made weekly. By the agreement it was provided that, for any night on which the theatre should not be open, or if from illness or any other cause the bankrupt should not be able to perform on any night, a proportionate part of the week's salary should not be paid. On July 23, 1891, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt, and on Aug. 23 he was adjudicated a bankrupt. Some time subsequent to the date of the receiving order, the bankrupt made an arrangement with Sir Augustus Harris that the latter should buy up as many as possible of the bankrupt's debts, and should deduct £20 a week from the bankrupt's salary under the agreement in order to repay himself the amount expended in buying up the debts. At the time when the order now appealed against was made, that deduction of £20 a week was being made. The bankrupt was then acting in the provinces, and earning £30 a week under the agreement. He was also paying alimony of £4 a week to his wife, under an order of the Divorce Division of the High Court. On the application of the official receiver, as the trustee in bankruptcy, the registrar made the order now appealed against.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 53 (2):

"Where a bankrupt is in the receipt of a salary or income other than as aforesaid . . . the court, on the application of the trustee, shall from time to time make such order as it thinks just for the payment of the salary . . . or of any part thereof, to the trustee, to be applied by him in such manner as the court may direct."

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and F. Cooper Willis for the bankrupt.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C.) and Muir Mackenzie for the trustee.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—Two points have been raised on this appeal, both of which involve questions as to the construction of provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The first question is whether the money to be earned by the bankrupt, under his agreement with Sir Augustus Harris, assuming that he does earn it, is "salary or income" within the meaning of s. 53 (2) of the Act. It was money to be paid to the bankrupt under a contract made between himself, an actor, and a theatrical manager; it was a mutual contract for services to be rendered on the one side, and payment to be made on the other side, and was, therefore, a contract of service and payment for service. The money was to be paid weekly or monthly, and, under certain circumstances, there might be a forfeiture of, or deductions from, the stipulated sums, but otherwise they were to be paid at specified times.

These sums of money, being payable under a contract, do not come within the rule laid down in Re Hutton, Ex parte Benwell (1), for they are not "precarious" income, as in that case. Here, the bankrupt had a right to these payments, and the other party had a right to the services of the bankrupt. It was said that one could not make the bankrupt act, and so earn the payments under the contract, and, therefore, that the earnings were precarious and uncertain. But he was bound under a legal obligation to act, and the other party was under a legal obligation to pay him for acting. I think, therefore, that these earnings, even if they were not "salary," were yet "income" in the nature of salary, and within s. 53 (2) of the Act. It has been held that "income" in the ordinary general sense is not within that section, that is, income which is property, and which consequently passes to the trustee in bankruptcy; this, however, is not property which passes to the trustee, but is income in the nature of salary as explained in Re Hutton, Ex parte Benwell (1). This, then, is at least "income" if it is not "salary," and, on the construction of the Act, I agree with the case relating to a commercial traveller which has been cited, Re Brindle, Ex parte Brindle (2), and think that this case is similar to that one.

This order was made on the assumption that the bankrupt was "in receipt of a salary or income," which "salary or income" amounted to £30 a week, and the

- A bankrupt was ordered to pay to the trustee £15 a week out of that £30. The question is whether he was "in receipt of" that £30 a week. I will assume that he was at first in receipt of that sum under the contract. As to that particular salary or income, which does not pass to the trustee in bankruptcy, the bankrupt is entitled to make any contract that he pleases without infringing on the bankruptcy laws, or on the right of his creditors, and he can deal with regard to that
- B "salary or income" as he likes. The bankrupt and the theatrical manager did make an agreement with regard to that salary or income, to the effect that the manager should, under certain circumstances, deduct £20 a week therefrom. They had a right to make that agreement. If the sum of £20 is so deducted, can it be said that the bankrupt is "in receipt of" the whole £30 within the meaning of s. 53 (2)? I think not. Under the circumstances which have arisen, the
- C theatrical manager does deduct, and the bankrupt does not receive, in law, truth, or fact, the sum of £20; the bankrupt only receives £10. Further than that, the law has taken away from him another £4 a week by an order of the Divorce Court to pay alimony, and, therefore, he only actually receives £6 a week for himself. Under these circumstances, ought the court to make an order deducting £15 a week from the bankrupt's earnings when he actually receives only £6 a week?
- D It cannot, of course, do so. I think that the bankrupt's statement as to his financial position is true, and that we must act on that statement in this court, and not send the matter back to the registrar for further litigation.

I am of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, no order ought to be made under s. 53 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that this appeal must be allowed.

- BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Two legal points have been raised. The first is whether the sums of money payable by the manager, under the written contract, to the bankrupt are "salary or income" within the meaning of s. 53 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. I am of opinion, on looking at the contract, that it is either "salary," or, if not "salary," at any rate "income" within the meaning
- F of that subsection. It seems to me that "salary" means a defined payment in money for services rendered under a contract to serve, which is to be computed with reference to time, and I think that this case falls within that definition. If, however, it is not "salary," it is certainly "income" as defined in Re Hutton, Ex parte Benwell (1), "income" which is ejusdem generis with "salary," that is to say, which possesses some of the specific qualities which "salary" possesses,
- G though not necessarily the same in all respects. I am further of opinion that these payments, even if they were not to be computed by time, but were to be computed by recurrent events, as suggested, would yet be "income" if not "salary."

- The second point is that the bankrupt was not "in receipt of a salary or income" of £30 a week as the order which has been made assumes. It seems to me that
- H a man is not "in receipt of a salary or income" when in fact he does not receive it and has no right to receive it, because, by his own contract, he has lost the right to receive it. The argument to the contrary is entirely fallacious, that it is in some way a fraud on the law of bankruptcy for a bankrupt to make such a contract. As LORD ESHER, M.R., has pointed out, the agreement between the manager and the bankrupt was a contract for personal services, to the benefit
- I of which the creditors of a bankrupt are not entitled under the bankruptcy law; the creditors, in respect of such a contract, have only the right, under s. 53 (2), to obtain an order for payment to the trustee, for their benefit, of the earnings under such a contract. The bankrupt may make any contract he pleases with reference to his earnings under such an agreement, and the creditors cannot interfere. He has done so in this case, with the result that he actually receives only £10 a week under the agreement. Under those circumstances, how can it be said that the bankrupt was "in receipt of" the full salary or income when he had contracted with his employer that the salary should be reduced to £10 for consideration? Section 53 cannot be made use of to displace any such contract as that, and cannot operate to set aside that contract in a roundabout way. As to the question of the discretion to make such an order, no judge would ever make an order on a man to pay away to one person money which he had already promised to pay to another. I agree that, in this case, no order at all ought to be made. A

FRY, L.J.—I regret that we have not before us all the written documents relating to the transactions between the bankrupt and his employer. With regard to the first question, whether these earnings of the bankrupt are “salary or income” within the meaning of s. 53 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, I am of opinion that they are “salary,” and that, if not “salary,” they are clearly “income,” that is, income in the nature of salary. Whenever these four predicates as to a sum of money payable to a man are satisfied, that is, whenever it is for services rendered, payable under a contract, computed by time, and payable at a fixed time or times, I am inclined to think that it is a salary, even though the payment may be liable to be terminated, or to have deductions made from it. That definition does not include everything which is salary, but I think that everything which satisfies that definition is salary. B C

Then comes the second question. It is said that the bankrupt was “in receipt of” a salary or income of £30 a week. I read those words, “in receipt of,” in s. 53 (2), as meaning in the actual receipt of the money, and the question is whether the bankrupt was in actual receipt of the salary or income alleged. I think that he was not, but that he was “in receipt of” £10 a week only, out of which he has to pay £4 a week under the order to pay alimony. The argument on behalf of the trustee that a deduction made from the payment by the payer is not a deduction to be taken into account if the payee voluntarily permits it is entirely misconceived. In this case, however, there is nothing to show that there was not a valid agreement that the deduction should be made. In my opinion, s. 53 (2) only gives the court a discretion to make an order when the bankrupt is in actual receipt of a salary or income, and does not give the court any power to restrain the bankrupt in his dealings with his salary or income, or to order him to work. Under the circumstances of this case, I think that no order at all ought to have been made, and this order must be set aside. D E F

If the initiation of a divorce suit be procured, and its conduct (especially if abstention from defence be a term) provided for by agreement, that constitutes collusion, although a finger cannot be placed on any fact as having been falsely dealt with or withheld. When the parties to a suit are acting in complete concert, the court is deprived of that security for eliciting the whole truth which is afforded by the contest of opposing interests and is rendered unable to pronounce a decree of dissolution of marriage with sufficient confidence in its justice. If a petitioner makes the institution of his suit and its proceedings a matter of bargain, stifling defence and recrimination by a covenant of silence, he cannot wonder if the court declines to be satisfied that it has before it all the material facts.

In a case where the court found that the initiation of the suit was procured, and its results as to costs and damages were settled, by agreement,

Held: there was collusion, and the petition must be dismissed.

Divorce—Collusion—Petition dismissed as tainted with collusion—Competency of fresh suit free from collusion.

The fact that a petition for divorce has been dismissed on the ground of collusion between the parties does not preclude the petitioner bringing a fresh suit free from the taint of collusion.

Intervention by the Queen's Proctor, on the ground of collusion, in a suit for divorce brought by the husband on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent.

The husband and wife entered into an agreement by which, the wife having committed adultery with the co-respondent, the husband undertook that he would take proceedings for divorce, but would not claim damages from the co-respondent, while the wife undertook not to defend the suit, to pay the costs thereof, and to settle a sum of money on the child of the marriage. The agreement having been disclosed to the court, the Queen's Proctor intervened and submitted that it was collusive and that the petition should be dismissed. E

Nov. 21, 1894. SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., read the following judgment. G
From the evidence before me I draw the following conclusions: (i) that the respondent and co-respondent are guilty of adultery; (ii) that the petitioner did not connive at such adultery; (iii) that there was no collusion to present to the court false facts in proof of adultery; (iv) that the petition was presented in accordance with, and in consequence of, the agreement come to between the parties. By this, I mean that the petitioner would have been content with a separation, could he so have obtained the pecuniary settlement he sought; and he would not have presented the petition, if he could not have secured himself against the risk of diverting his wife's property from his child. It was strongly urged on me that the petitioner would, in any case, have presented a petition for a divorce, and that the unwillingness exhibited to the respondent's solicitor was a justifiable stratagem to secure a favourable settlement. I cannot accept this view; (v) that it was, in fact, part of the agreement that the wife and co-respondent should not defend the suit; (vi) that it was not shown that there were any specific facts material to defence or recrimination which might have been brought forward by the wife. But it appears to me impossible to say that it was proved that there were no material facts which she could have brought forward by way of defence or recrimination. The petitioner, the petitioner's solicitors, and the respondent's solicitors denied that they knew of any such facts, but such statements do not appear to be conclusive on the point. H I

A The question is whether, under these circumstances, the petitioner should be held disentitled to a divorce by reason of collusion with the respondent. It was contended for the petitioner that the collusion necessary to be shown was that described in the latter part of s. 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, as "collusion for the purpose of obtaining a divorce contrary to the justice of the case," and his counsel drew a distinction between such collusion and that referred to in s. 30 of the Act of 1857. It is, however, to be observed that the intervention of the Queen's Proctor is not under the latter, but under the earlier, part of s. 7, where the phrase is simply "collusion." But the point is not very material, because, as an alternative, it was urged—and this is, indeed, the real gist of his argument—that all collusion meant "collusion for the purpose of obtaining a divorce contrary to the justice of the case," in a sense, presently to be mentioned, which counsel ascribed to the words. Whatever be the meaning of collusion, I cannot doubt that it bears the same meaning in s. 30 of the Act of 1857 and in both parts of s. 7 of the Act of 1860. It seems to be impossible to suppose that a totally different sense is to be assigned to the collusion which vitiates a claim for divorce if discovered by the judge at the trial before a decree nisi is pronounced, and that brought to his knowledge by the Queen's Proctor before or after such decree.

D The contest raised in this case as to the meaning of collusion proceeds on clear lines. On the one hand, it is urged that collusion is agreement, either, on the positive side, to put forward true facts in support of a false case, or false facts in support of a true case; or, on the negative side, to suppress facts which would prevent, or tend to prevent, the court granting a divorce. It was insisted that, in a suit against a wife, unless it be shown that the petitioner's charge of adultery was, in fact, unfounded, or was supported by false evidence, in that material facts in support of defence or recrimination were concealed, there was no collusion. On the other hand, it was maintained that collusion has a wider scope; and that if there be an agreement to prosecute a suit which induces the petitioner to prosecute it, and, a fortiori, if such agreement contain terms providing for the petitioner's costs, and providing that the case shall not be defended and damages not asked, that is collusion, even though it be not shown that adultery was not, in fact, committed or any false facts put forward to prove it, and though no specific facts adverse to the success of the claim for divorce are shown to have been concealed.

F There would seem, therefore, to be four questions that may be asked. First, it is collusion to procure the initiation and prosecution of a suit, and arrange the mode and terms of its conduct, by agreement, though there be no express stipulation that there shall be no defence and no specific ground for suspicion that a false case is put forward or material facts concealed? Secondly, does the addition of a term that there shall be no defence render the agreement collusive? Thirdly, is it collusion when, besides such an agreement, there is ground for suspicion that material facts may be concealed? Or, fourthly, is there collusion only when it is shown that, in consequence of such agreement, false matter has been introduced into the case or material facts suppressed? In support of the more limited view of the nature of collusion, reliance is placed on definitions which, at various times, and with more or less authority, have been given of collusion. MR. MACQUEEN in his book on MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE (2nd Edn.), p. 67, summarises the matter thus:

I "According to the authorities there appear to be two kinds of collusion—first, where the parties put forward false facts to form the basis of the judgment; secondly, where the parties put forward facts which are true, but which have been corruptly and fraudulently preconcerted to form the basis of the judgment."

This definition is, however, obviously incomplete in omitting the suppression of material facts of defence or recrimination as one kind of collusion, and it, therefore, shuts out the further consideration which arises—if it be admitted that such suppression does constitute collusion—namely, whether it must be shown that material facts were, in fact, concealed. It is remarkable that the learned author goes on to mention Chisim's Case (1) in the House of Lords, without apparently noticing, as I shall presently remark, what an extension of collusion that case appears to afford.

In Crewe v. Crewe (2) LORD STOWELL said (3 Hag. Ecc. at pp. 129, 130, 131):

"Collusion may exist without connivance, but connivance is (generally) collusion for a particular purpose. Collusion, as applied to this subject, is an agreement between the parties for one to commit, or appear to commit, an act of adultery, in order that the other may obtain a remedy at law as for a real injury. Real injury there is none, where there is a common agreement between the parties to effect their object by fraud in a court of justice. If such conduct were permissible, it would authorise parties to violate their marriage vow, and would encourage profligate and dissolute manners. The law, therefore, requires that there should be no co-operation for such a purpose, and does not grant a remedy where the adultery is committed with any such view. It is a fraud difficult of proof, since the agreement may be known to no one but the two parties in the cause, who, alone, may be concerned in it, for the adulterer may be ignorant of the understanding. However, it is no decisive proof of collusion that, after the adultery has been committed, both parties desire a separation; it would be hard that the husband should not be released because the offending wife equally wishes it. She may have honest or dishonest reasons, innocent or profligate; an aversion to live with the man she has injured, a desire to live uncontrolled or to fly into the arms of the adulterer; it would be unjust that the husband should depend upon her inclinations for his release; he has a right to it. It has often been said, and with peculiar injustice, that, although the original adultery was not collusive, yet the proceedings in these courts lead ultimately to collusion in the conduct of the cause; because, as the suit is between the suffering and the offending party, the latter frequently prays a sentence which she does not wish to obtain. On a little consideration, however, it will be seen that this arises from a wise provision of law: the canon [i.e., the 105th canon] directs that a divorce shall not go upon the mere confession of the party; the wife, therefore, must give a negative issue (indeed, the court is almost bound to reject an affirmative issue, since it is necessary, by the canon, that evidence should be produced); she must deny her guilt, and her prayer must be according to her denial. But this is mere style and form. If the court sees a fair case made out, what may be the inclination of the wife, be it corrupt or honest, is of little importance; the question is whether the husband has received a real injury, and bona fide seeks relief."

I think that in this passage LORD STOWELL was considering, as indeed he says, only the view of the matter applicable to the case before him. It is, no doubt, collusion where there is an agreement between the parties for one to commit, or appear to commit, an act of adultery, in order that the other may obtain a remedy at law, as for a real injury. But, there again, is omitted, because in that case not relevant, the kind of collusion which results from suppression. It is to be observed, however, how carefully LORD STOWELL limits the case in which he excludes collusion to that of a mere desire of both parties to obtain a separation, and does not deal with the results of such a common desire leading to an agreement relative to the suit, still less those of the desire on the part of the husband being induced by extraneous considerations offered by the wife; and it is to be further observed, that LORD STOWELL insists that the husband must have received a real and bona fide injury.

This leaves open the question: In what cases is relief sought bona fide? Great reliance was placed by counsel for the petitioner on the definitions of collusion

A given by DR. LUSHINGTON and the Lord Advocate for Scotland before the Select Committee of the House of Lords in 1844, appended to the report of the Royal Commission appointed in 1850. I, therefore, refer to them, though they are extrajudicial opinions. DR. LUSHINGTON said:

B "190. A question was put to me as to collusion. I beg leave to observe that, in the sense in which it is used in Doctors' Commons, it does not mean even consent or facility, where there is just cause for the husband prosecuting the suit, or vice versa; but it is permitting a false case to be substantiated, or keeping back a just defence. It may be a question whether this rule of collusion extends to cases where recrimination, though practicable, is not resorted to. 191. Do you mean, by saying 'where recrimination is practicable and is not resorted to,' that the collusion consists in the abstaining from recrimination?—Yes; but I do not say that so doing has been deemed to be collusion in the legal sense of the term. . . . 194. Then, do you understand that wherever there is a case where the fact of adultery, cruelty, and so forth exists, provided that the fact is not got up for the purpose of the proceeding, it would not be a case of collusion, though the parties were in collusion as to the proceeding in court?—Certainly, we should not call it collusion; on the contrary, the expressions which have fallen from the learned judges have been these, and I think they are founded on truth: 'If the wife has already committed the greatest possible offence against the husband by violating his bed, why should she add to it by increasing the expense of the remedy?' 195. Are you not aware that, to a certain degree, the same principle holds with divorce Bills, for that, if the wife does not make any defence, which is the case with a great majority of those Bills, it is reckoned no proof of collusion?—Certainly. 196. And so, if the paramour makes no defence to the action, and lets judgment go by default, it is no proof of collusion?—Certainly."

F It is, I think, obvious that DR. LUSHINGTON chiefly desired to insist that the mere abstention from defence did not constitute collusion, and that the case was not presented to his mind of an agreement between the parties, providing for the bringing of a suit and for the terms on which it was to be conducted, including a stipulation that there should be no defence, and of the inference to be drawn from such an agreement.

The following questions were put to the Lord Advocate for Scotland, and answers given by him:

G "93. Would it be collusion if the party had actually committed adultery without any collusion, and if then the other party and the adulterous party were colluding together to get a divorce?—That is, I believe, an interpretation pretty generally put upon it. My own impression is that such is not the true meaning of collusion. I mean, that if a just cause for a divorce exists without collusion, and, that the party wronged seeks to have the remedy of divorce, and is entitled to it, I doubt whether the circumstance that the other party has no objection, or is well pleased, would be such collusion as to preclude the remedy. 94. So that, if adultery had really been committed, not for the purpose of getting a divorce, but independently of that, it would be no collusion such as to bar the remedy if the parties entered into a sort of plan for getting a divorce grounded upon that adultery?—I think that, according to the original meaning of collusion, it would not be so; but, if you were to examine them very strictly as to whether they had any collusion in bringing the suit, what would be the effect of the parties admitting that they knew of the suit being intended to be brought, and that they had no objection to it, but that, on the contrary, they had allowed the writ to be served, and dispensed with the time and afforded other facilities, I cannot say."

It is clear that the Lord Advocate expressly abstained from pronouncing an opinion on circumstances in some respects similar to those in the present case. It should, however, be added that a little later he expressed the view that the mere circumstance of people going to Scotland to be divorced, as they might go to be married, would not constitute a divorce. It is not necessary to say more on that point than that the mere agreement to do what is necessary to give jurisdiction falls far short of the agreement in this case. A

Counsel for the petitioner further relied on the expressions used by LORD CHELMSFORD in Shaw v. Gould (3), which are, no doubt, of great weight, though they were not necessary for the decision of the case. They were as follows (L.R. 3 H.L. at pp. 77, 78): B

“But whatever may be ultimately entertained as to the extent of the power of the Scottish courts to dissolve English marriages, the validity of the divorce of the appellants’ mother from Buxton cannot be admitted, if it was obtained by concert or collusion. It was argued for the appellants that the only collusion which can affect the validity of a divorce is where there are concert and connivance in the acts upon which the decree proceeds, and that, if a just cause of divorce exists without collusion, any arrangement to bring the facts before a court of competent jurisdiction, however purchased or obtained, is unobjectionable. I quite agree that if the agreement in this case had been that Buxton should bring himself within the reach of the Scottish court, so as to enable his wife to institute a suit for a divorce, to be determined upon the merits, although it was stipulated that he was to receive a sum of money when the divorce was obtained, this would not amount to collusion. But the arrangement between the parties was of a different character. In order to make it possible for the contemplated marriage between the father and mother of the appellants to take place, the previous dissolution of the marriage with Buxton was absolutely necessary. Shaw, therefore, who was intent upon attaining his object, stipulated that Buxton should be paid a sum of money in case he was divorced, and restrained him from attempting to defeat the proceedings by imposing upon him the forfeiture of the money in case he should ‘by himself, or by any one through him, give information which should be prejudicial to the divorce.’ Such an agreement as this appears to me to come within the very words of the oath de calumnia, which was required to be taken by Mrs. Buxton, by which she swore ‘that there had been no concert or collusion between her and the defender, or her friends or agents, in raising the action in order to obtain a divorce against him; nor did she know, believe, or suspect that there had been any concert or agreement between any other person on her behalf and the said defender or any other person on his behalf, with the view or for the purpose of obtaining such divorce.’ It is impossible to doubt that the disclosure to the court of the agreement between the parties upon which the action was raised might have been prejudicial to the divorce, and Buxton would have run the risk of forfeiting the money he was to receive if he had given information about it.” C

It would appear, therefore, to have been LORD CHELMSFORD’s opinion—first, that the agreement by a respondent to come within Scottish jurisdiction for the purpose of a divorce being obtained against him, although accompanied by a stipulation that he should receive a certain sum when the divorce was obtained, did not constitute collusion; and, secondly, that the addition of a term that he should forfeit the money if he gave information prejudicial to the divorce did amount to collusion, because the disclosure to the court of the agreement might have been prejudicial to the divorce. LORD WESTBURY also (ibid. at p. 87) was of opinion that the decree was collusively obtained, but did not state on what grounds that opinion was based. An agreement to come within the jurisdiction in order that the suit might be brought would, no doubt, not constitute collusion. I venture, with all respect, to think that an agreement that the respondent should be paid if the suit succeeded was at least open to considerable doubt, and this must, it appears to me, have, in truth, been LORD CHELMSFORD’s view, because he thought D

A it collusion to agree, in effect, to conceal those stipulations, as their disclosure might be prejudicial to the divorce. But is not the agreement in this case substantially of the same character as that which LORD CHELMSFORD and LORD WESTBURY condemned? Is not an agreement not to defend tantamount in effect to an agreement not to disclose anything prejudicial to the divorce? Although the present petitioner prudently and properly revealed his agreement with the respondent, it is clear that the respondent placed it, by agreement, out of her power to make such a disclosure, and, if so, that agreement became, like the agreement in Shaw v. Gould (3), collusion.

C It was pressed strongly on me that, in Hunt v. Hunt and Wright (Queen's Proctor intervening) (4), LORD HANNEN lent the weight of his authority to the narrower view of collusion. In that case it was alleged that the petitioner had been guilty of conduct conducing to his wife's adultery, and that he induced her to refrain from defending the suit by promising not to press for costs against the co-respondent. It would appear that the jury thought that these allegations were well founded. If so, there was, beyond question, a collusive agreement to conceal facts not only material but conclusive. No doubt, however, the President is reported to have said, in summing-up to the jury (47 L.J.P. at p. 22):

D "Now, collusion is this—if a party to a suit of this kind, by agreement with the others, procures the withdrawal from the notice of the court of facts which are relevant to the charge which is imputed to him or her, that is collusion. . . . Were these facts that were pertinent and material, and such as ought properly to have been submitted to a court or jury to enable them to determine one or other of the charges against the petitioner—of course that will depend on the answer you give to the first two questions I here put to you—namely, was his conduct such as conducing to his wife's adultery? Did he habitually use foul and indecent language to her?"

F It should, I think, be added that, in suggesting the cases in which there would, or would not, be collusion, LORD HANNEN appears to have put, as the test, whether the husband did, or did not, feel that the motives for the concealment which he stipulated for were relevant to the charge made against him. It would, no doubt, appear from portions of his summing-up that LORD HANNEN regarded proof that material, nay, even decisive, facts were concealed by agreement, as necessary to make out collusion. But it must be remembered that, being addressed to a jury, it was not necessary, or indeed desirable, for him to do more than state as much law as covered the case in hand; and I think that the view of LORD HANNEN, expressed in his summing-up, ought not to be put higher than this, that, where the main evidence of collusion is an agreement not to defend, in order to find collusion you must see that it was intended to conceal material facts. It would appear, from Bacon v. Bacon and Ashby (Queen's Proctor intervening) (5), decided shortly before Hunt v. Hunt and Wright (Queen's Proctor intervening) (4), that LORD HANNEN considered that agreement between the parties to withhold relevant evidence was one form only of collusion; and also that the evidence need be relevant only, and not decisive. The latter point is now established by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Butler v. Butler (6), which I recently followed in Rogers v. Rogers (Queen's Proctor showing cause) (7). Giving, therefore, full weight to Hunt v. Hunt and Wright (Queen's Proctor intervening) (4), it does not appear to me to conclude a case such as the present, where, apart from any agreement not to defend, there is so much more.

I It is now necessary to consider the authorities relied on by the Queen's Proctor. They begin with decisions of the House of Lords before the Act of 1857. It was contended before me that these decisions are not binding on this court. I am clear, however, that they are authorities of the greatest weight. In Shaw v. Gould (3) LORD WESTBURY said (L.R. 3 H.L. at p. 84):

"In England, since the Reformation, marriage, being no longer a sacrament, has always, in theory of law, been dissoluble for adultery in the wife, and for incestuous adultery and other crimes by the husband; but, until the recent Divorce Act, this law was administered by Parliament alone, and although the decision of Parliament was in the form of an Act or privilege, and not of a judicial decree, yet the Act was granted upon evidence proving that the case came within the scope of certain established rules. This proceeding was in spirit a judicial, though in form a legislative, act. The justice of divorce was recognised, but no forensic tribunal was entrusted with the power of applying the remedy. But the law and practice of Parliament were well known, and, in fact, this House acted as a court of justice."

It may be added that those decisions of the House of Lords have been repeatedly recognised as authorities, and, notably so, by this court in a case I shall presently mention. By its Standing Order of Mar. 28, 1798, No. 142 (MACQUEEN ON THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS, 528, 791), the House of Lords imposed on itself the duty of inquiring

"whether there has or has not been any collusion, directly or indirectly, on his (the petitioner's) part, relative to any act of adultery that may have been committed by his wife; or whether there be any collusion, directly or indirectly, between him and his wife, or any other person or persons, touching the said bill of divorce, or touching any proceedings or sentence of divorce had in the ecclesiastical court at his suit; or touching any action at law which may have been brought by such petitioner against any person for criminal conversation with the petitioner's wife. . . ."

There can, I think, be no doubt that the provisions as to collusion in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, were intended to continue the practice of the House of Lords in divorce cases. It is, therefore, all important to see what the House of Lords considered collusion to be. In Chisim's Case (1) it appeared that the costs of the plaintiff in the action for crim. con. were paid by the respondent's father, and also that in the ecclesiastical court no witnesses were called for the wife. The report states:

"The adultery was clearly proved; but the appearances of collusion were too gross and palpable to admit of being overlooked or explained."

It cannot possibly be said that in that case it was shown that any specific material facts were concealed; and it is expressly stated that the adultery was proved. It seems to me, therefore, that no collusion is possible, except that the House of Lords considered collusion to be made out from the fact that the parties in the conduct of the proceedings were acting in concert. No doubt the inference was that where such concert existed it was impossible to be sure that all the truth was presented; but the point is, that proof of concert in the conduct of the proceedings was held sufficient to engender such a doubt.

In Edwards' Case (8) the report states:

"The evidence of adultery in this case was clear; but a bond signed by Captain Edwards was produced, dated Dec. 10, 1778, securing payment of £45 a year to his wife; who, on the other hand, 'conditioned, on her part, that she and all those who were or might become concerned for her in her defence to the said Thomas Edwards obtaining a divorce would not give any unnecessary delay in the proceeding thereof, but in all things conform herself and themselves so as to bring the said suit and proceedings to as speedy an issue as possible; yet, nevertheless, not so as to weaken any real defence that the said Judith might be able to make to the said proceedings or the said Thomas Edwards obtaining his said divorce.'"

The Bill, after counsel had been heard as to the effect of this document, was rejected; and it was so treated, therefore, merely as proof that the parties had agreed there should be no defence, and this single fact was considered to establish

A collusion. In George's Case (9) there were circumstances connected with a prior separation between the parties as to which the House was clearly not satisfied; but, besides this, great stress was laid on the fact that there had been a contract between the parties with respect to the verdict in the common law court. Beyond doubt this fact was considered of great weight; but it would have been of no weight had it not, in the judgment of the House, by itself gone far, if not the whole way, to establish collusion.

I now turn to the decisions in this court. In Midgley (falsely called Wood) v. Wood (10), which was a case of nullity by reason of the undue publication of banns, SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL expressed his opinion that in a suit for dissolution by reason of adultery it would be collusion if the parties were to concur in getting up evidence of the case, though the case were a true one. The learned Judge Ordinary suggested that there might be a distinction in this respect in the case of a suit for nullity, where both parties might institute the suit on the same grounds; and this appears to me to show that the view of SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL was that collusion existed where one party, contrary to his or her apparent interest, was found acting in concert with the other, in matters material to the suit.

Lloyd v. Lloyd and Chichester (11), decided by the full court, consisting of CRESSWELL, J.O., WIGHTMAN, J., and BYLES, J., presents facts bearing very close resemblance to those in the present case. The adultery of the respondent, who had left her husband and was living with the co-respondent, was unquestionable. The court held that it did not find that the husband connived at, or was accessory to, the adultery; nor was any matrimonial misconduct imputed to him. But it was discovered by the court that the petitioner had received money from the wife's father to induce him to proceed with the suit (there being ground to think that he fancied that a dissolution of the marriage would cause him to lose a reversionary interest under a settlement); that his costs in the action for crim. con. were provided by the wife's father; that neither costs nor damages were to be demanded against the co-respondent; and that the wife's father and the co-respondent assisted in getting up the evidence. The court, referring to Chisim's Case (1), held that the appearance of collusion was too gross and palpable for any court to overlook it. The material elements in that case, namely, that the petitioner received consideration to prosecute the suit, and had his costs secured, are present here. It is true that, in that case, the parties acted together to get up the evidence, whereas, in this case, that was not done because it was unnecessary. But the material point is that, in that case, no more than in this, was it suggested that any false facts were put forward, or any material facts concealed. The utmost that can be said is that the court had before it parties, not independent, but acting throughout in concert; and the principle to be gathered from that case appears to be that, under such circumstances, the court is forced to believe that it is being misled, or, at any rate, that it can feel no assurance that it is not.

In the face of these two cases, I think it impossible to say that in Jessop v. Jessop (12), decided shortly after the two last-mentioned cases, in 1861, SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL intended to limit collusion to cases in which the agreement was to keep back evidence of a good answer, or to set up a false case; nor do I think that the words he used in his summing-up to the jury bear such a meaning. In Gethin v. Gethin (Queen's Proctor intervening) (13), decided later in 1861, I am inclined to think that SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL intended to express an opinion that, if it were shown that a husband who was respondent withdrew charges against his wife and made no defence, not acting independently but in pursuance of an agreement, that would constitute collusion. It is true, however, that in that case there was ground for suggesting that the wife had been guilty of adultery, though the jury found she had not; but it cannot be said that there was any concealment of the case of adultery, because the husband had, in fact, previously filed and abandoned a petition. But I am not sure that the case leads to any clear conclusion; neither do I attach much importance to Harris v. Harris and Lambert (14), in which it appeared that the respondent had assisted the petitioner's case by facilitating proof of identification, and SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL said (31 A L.J.P.M. & A. at p. 160) :

"Such communications are always dangerous, and cannot fail to excite some suspicion of collusion. I took time to examine the evidence, and I see no reason to believe that the parties were acting in collusion."

I will only say that I do not think that that case in any way militates against the view more fully expressed by SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL in other cases I have mentioned. Probably the learned judge thought that the concert between the parties was not upon a matter sufficiently material to the suit to amount to collusion.

Barnes v. Barnes and Grimwade (Queen's Proctor intervening) (15), decided in 1867 by LORD PENZANCE, is not so strong an authority as Lloyd v. Lloyd and Chichester (11), because in Barnes v. Barnes and Grimwade (Queen's Proctor intervening) (15), the husband induced his wife, for a consideration, not to oppose; but there were, no doubt, some facts brought to light which, if disclosed to the court, might have induced it to refuse the decree. Still, the words of LORD PENZANCE appear to me to indicate that his view of collusion did not differ from that of SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL. His Lordship said (L.R. 1 P. & D. at pp. 507, 508) :

"I am of opinion that, although the petitioner was reckless in his conduct, and careless whether his wife committed adultery or not, the evidence does not go so far as to establish actual connivance. But he certainly exposed his wife to temptation, to which no wife ought to be exposed by her husband, and was guilty of neglect and misconduct conducing to the adultery. With regard to collusion, I agree with the learned counsel that the mere fact of his having given her money, both before and after the institution of the suit, does not prove collusion. I see no impropriety in a husband making his wife a reasonable allowance while a suit is pending, in order to save the expense of an application to the court for alimony. If that evidence stood alone I should hold that it is not sufficient to prove the charge of collusion; but the evidence goes much further. It amounted in substance to this—that the petitioner said to the respondent, 'If you do not oppose, I shall get a divorce cheaper than if you do; therefore keep quiet, and I will give you some money when the decree is obtained, and I will do no harm to the co-respondent.' If that is not collusion I do not know what is. It is said that she had no defence to offer, and it certainly seems that she had not, as far as her own adultery is concerned. But if she had brought to the knowledge of the court the facts which have now been proved, as to the petitioner's conduct in exposing her to temptation, it would have been a grave question whether the court would have granted a decree. For these reasons, I think that the Queen's Proctor has proved the allegation that material facts have been suppressed. I think that the charge of collusion is also established. The petition must, therefore, be dismissed."

That judgment, taken as a whole, seems to me to show that from the agreement not to defend, if it had stood alone, he would have inferred collusion.

On the whole, it appears to me that the authority of the House of Lords (as shown by its practice) and of SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL, is decidedly in favour of the proposition that, if the initiation of a suit be procured, and its conduct (especially if abstention from defence be a term) provided for by agreement, that constitutes collusion, although no one can put his finger on any fact falsely dealt with or withheld; and I do not think that the authority of LORD STOWELL, DR. LUSHINGTON, LORD PENZANCE, or SIR JAMES HANNEN can be invoked in favour of a contrary opinion. It must always be remembered that, in matrimonial proceedings, this court has imposed upon it, by its previous practice and by the provisions of the Act of 1857, the peculiar duty of ascertaining for itself, so far as it can, whether in any case there exist bars, absolute or discretionary, to the

A petitioner's claim. I am not, therefore, prepared to say that the reason underlying what I think is the effect of the decisions of the House of Lords and of the Matrimonial Causes Acts of 1857 and 1860 may not be that, when the parties to a suit are acting in complete concert, the court is deprived of that security for eliciting the whole truth which is afforded by the contest of opposing interests, and is rendered unable to pronounce a decree of dissolution of marriage with sufficient confidence in its justice. If this be so, the expression in s. 7 of the Act of 1860, "collusion for obtaining a divorce contrary to the justice of the case," may be understood to indicate that, by such an agreement, justice is imperilled; but, not to require that it must be affirmatively shown that, having regard only to the matrimonial conduct of the parties, justice will not be, or has not been, done. No doubt the protection to the court, afforded by the mutual watchfulness of hostile parties, often does not exist, because the petitioner and the respondent may, independently of each other, be of the same mind. Against results of that unanimity no legislation can guard. But it may well be worth while to prevent the parties to a suit from binding themselves by an agreement which, if there be anything to hide, renders it obligatory on both of them to keep the veil drawn. At least, if a petitioner makes the institution of his suit and its proceedings a matter of bargain, stifling defence and recrimination by a covenant of silence, he cannot wonder if the court decline to be satisfied that it has before it all the material facts. Such a petitioner has mistaken his position. Pacem et duellum miscuit. He appears before the court in the character of an injured husband asking relief from an intolerable wrong; but if, at the same time, he is acting in concert with the authors of the wrong, and is subjecting his rights to pecuniary stipulations, I he raises more than a doubt whether, in the words of LORD STOWELL, he has received a real injury and bona fide seeks relief.

In the present case, being of opinion, as I have said, that the initiation of the suit was procured, and its results as to costs and damages were settled, by agreement, I must hold that there was collusion. If it be necessary, in order to constitute collusion, that there should be a compact not to defend, that also was present in this instance. Further, if it be needful that suspicion of the concealment of some facts be entertained, I entertain suspicion (I do not wish to say more) as to the facts in regard to the husband's conduct, from the expressions used by the wife in her letters. But I do not think it has been, nor, in my opinion, need it be shown, that any specific facts of a material character exist which might have been brought before the court. I was much pressed by counsel with the hardship on the petitioner of dismissing his petition and of rendering the agreement of no effect. But I cannot assent to that view. As regards freedom from an adulterous wife, if the petitioner desires that, for its own sake, I see nothing to prevent his filing a petition without agreement with her. As regards the obtaining of pecuniary advantage, for himself or his child, I must say that a divorce suit ought not, in my judgment, to be made the stipulated price of any pecuniary consideration.

H The intervention of the Queen's Proctor must, therefore, succeed, but there will be no order as to costs. I was pressed to say that the disclosure of the agreement at the trial negatived collusion. I cannot follow that suggestion. Confession is not a defence; nor is disclosure a proof of innocence. But I think that the conduct of the petitioner, in making this disclosure, entitles him to favourable consideration as to costs.

ARROW SHIPPING CO., LTD. v. TYNE IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS. THE CRYSTAL

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Herschell, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Ashbourne, Lord Macnaghten and Lord Morris), March 19, 20, June 22, 1894]

Shipping—Wreck—Removal—Liability of shipowner—Abandonment of wreck before removal by harbour authority—"Removal"—Dispersal by explosives—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict., c. 27), s. 56.

By s. 56 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847: "The harbour master may remove any wreck or other obstruction to the harbour . . . or the approaches to the same . . . and the expense of removing any such wreck [or] obstruction . . . shall be repaid by the owner of the same. . . ."

On Jan. 7, 1892, without any negligence on the part of the appellants or their servants, a ship owned by the appellants, as the result of a collision, was sunk within the approaches to the respondents' harbour in such a position as to form an obstruction within s. 56. On or about Jan. 9 they informed the respondents that they had abandoned the vessel as a wreck in the open sea. Subsequently, the respondents dispersed the wreck by explosives, and then brought an action against the appellants to recover the expense so incurred less a sum received for the sale of salvaged cargo and materials.

Held: the "owner" of a wreck within s. 56 was the person to whom the wreck belonged, not at the time the obstruction was created, but at the time when the harbour master exercised his statutory powers of removal and the expense was incurred; before the latter date the appellants had declared that they had abandoned all rights of property, and given up all interest, in the vessel, without any intention of resuming possession or ownership; and, therefore, the respondents' action failed.

Per LORD MACNAGHTEN: To entitle the harbour master to repayment under s. 56 it is incumbent on him to remove the obstruction in such a manner that at the conclusion of the operation it is substantially in the same condition as it was at the commencement, or, at any rate, with some regard to the interest of the owner. To disperse a wreck by explosives is not the sort of removal which is contemplated by the section. Under it the harbour master is not given power to destroy. In the present case there was, not removal, but total destruction.

June 22, 1894. The following opinions were read.

- H LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The question raised by this appeal is one of considerable importance. The facts are few and not in dispute. The vessel Crystal, of which the appellants were registered owners, was, on Jan. 7, 1892, sunk in the German Ocean below low-water mark, 400 yards east of the end of the South Pier at the mouth of the river Tyne. The disaster was the result of a collision, but there is no evidence how this was caused, or that any blame was to be attributed to the owners of the Crystal or their servants. On the morning of Jan. 8 Mr. Dent, the managing owner of the Crystal, gave notice to Mr. Scorfield, the representative of an association in which the vessel was largely insured, that he would have to take possession of her as the ship was past redemption; to which Mr. Scorfield seems to have made no objection. The vessel, in the position in which she lay, was both an obstruction to the approaches to the port and harbour of Newcastle-upon-Tyne and a danger to the navigation thereof. The Tyne Commissioners, accordingly, gave notice to the appellants that they would remove the obstruction, destroying it if necessary, and in the meantime would buoy and light it. The commissioners acted upon this notice and destroyed and dispersed the obstruction A by means of explosives.

The present action was then brought to recover the expenses thus incurred beyond what was recouped by the sale of the materials. The respondent's claim, in so far as it relates to the expense of removing the wreck, is based on s. 56 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which is in these terms :

"The harbour master may remove any wreck or other obstruction to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the approaches to the same, and also any floating timber which impedes the navigation thereof; and the expense of removing any such wreck, obstruction or floating timber shall be repaid by the owner of the same, and the harbour master may detain any such wreck or floating timber for securing the expenses, and on non-payment of such expenses, on demand, may sell such wreck or floating timber, and out of the proceeds of such sale pay such expenses, rendering the overplus, if any, to the owner on demand."

The courts below have followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Eglinton v. Norman (1), where it was held that the section I have just quoted casts upon the persons who were the owners of the vessel at the time she became a wreck and impeded the navigation a personal liability to pay the costs of removing the obstruction. I quite agree with them that there is no substantial distinction between that case and the present. It is contended, however, on behalf of the appellants, that a decision of this House in River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (2), delivered after the date of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Eglinton v. Norman (1), has thrown doubt on that decision, and indicated that the section B ought not to be so construed as to cast upon the owners of a vessel under such circumstances a liability unknown to the common law.

River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (2) turned upon another section of the same Act, namely, s. 74, which makes the owner of every vessel or float of timber answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier. F
In that case damage was done by the respondent's vessel to the appellants' pier without any fault upon the part of the respondent. The Court of Appeal had held that the respondent was not liable, mainly on the ground that the damage was caused by the act of God. Although the judgment was affirmed in this House, the noble and learned Lords who heard the case did not rest their opinions on this ground. LORD CAIRNS, L.C., came to the conclusion that the section was not intended to create a right to recover damages in cases where before the Act there was not a right to recover damages from someone, but that it was intended only to provide a ready and simple procedure for recovering damages where a right to damages existed at common law. He thought that the section relieved the undertakers from the investigation whether the fault had been the fault of the owner or of the charterers or of the persons in charge, and taking the owner as the person G who is always discoverable by means of the register, declared that he should be the person answerable, leaving him to recover over against the person liable. LORD HATHERLEY, after expressing the very great doubt and difficulty which he had felt as to the proper interpretation of the clause, said that, as it was the opinion of the majority of their Lordships that the case was not one that could be regarded as struck at by this clause, whether the ground to be assigned for it was the view I expressed by LORD CAIRNS, or whether any view might be adopted similar to that taken in the court below, he should not pause to inquire, but that he was unwilling to do anything further than to say that he could not concur in the opinion expressed by the Lord Chancellor otherwise than with extreme doubt and hesitation.

LORD O'HAGAN thought that the section pointed to something done by the act of man, or to the act of the person in charge. LORD BLACKBURN stated that he had very great doubt and hesitation in the case, and that he could not see anything

A in the language of the Act to justify the view adopted by LORD O'HAGAN that it was confined to cases in which someone was in charge of the ship, but that, after much hesitation and doubt, he was not prepared to say that the judgment should be reversed, and that the words "damage done by such ship" necessarily included all expenses occasioned by misfortunes in which the ship was involved in common with the piers. After referring to the fact that MELLISH, L.J., in the court below
B seemed to have thought that the words might bear the more restricted sense of injuria cum damno he concluded thus (2 App. Cas. at pp. 772, 773):

"The declared object of the enactment is the protection of the piers, etc., 'from injury,' which renders this construction a little less violent than if the object had been expressed to be to protect the harbour authorities from 'loss.'
C If they can bear that sense, we ought to construe them so; and though I have had and have great doubt whether this is not too violent a construction, I am not prepared to reverse the judgment based on it, and consequently I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs."

LORD GORDON dissented from the judgment pronounced, and thought that the appellants were entitled to succeed.

D I think a review of the opinions thus pronounced is sufficient to show that no principle can be extracted from the speeches in that case which can be applied to the construction of other sections of the Act. Although I am of opinion that in the present case, there being no evidence that the disaster was due to the negligence either of the appellants or their servants, they would be under no liability at common law for damage caused by the obstruction as for the expenses incurred
E in removing it, yet I am unable to find any valid ground on which the operation of s. 56, which casts upon the owner the liability to pay for the expenses of removing the obstruction, can be limited to cases in which such liability would exist at common law. I am fully alive to the force of the argument, and feel much impressed by it, that the obstruction is removed for the benefit of the public at large, and that where the owner of the vessel which has met with a disaster has not been
F to blame, it is hard that the loss of his vessel should entail on him the further burden of bearing expenses incurred, not for his benefit, but for that of the public. But a sense of the possible injustice of legislation ought not to induce your Lordships to do violence to well settled rules of construction, though it may properly lead to the selection of one rather than the other of two possible interpretations of the enactment. In the present case, however, I am unable to see that there
G are two alternative constructions. The harbour-master may remove "any wreck," and the expense of removing "any such wreck" is to be "repaid by the owner of the same." Where is there any ground for restricting this to cases where the owner of the wreck is himself, if not bound to remove it, at least subject to liability for damage caused by its presence, if he does not take that course? I can find none.

H The appellants further contended that if a new statutory liability was imposed by the section, the same enactment provided the remedy, and that those who desired to enforce the liability were limited to the remedy thus provided. It was urged that the section conferred the remedy of detaining and selling the wreck and satisfying the expenses out of the proceeds; that it did not provide any other mode of recovering the expenses; and that the harbour authority was, therefore,
I restricted to this remedy. This argument found favour with the Irish Court of Appeal in The Edith (3), and they gave effect to it by their judgment in that case, when the construction of a similar provision came before them for determination. I confess I have approached the consideration of the terms of the statute with no indisposition to arrive at the same conclusion, but I am unable to do so. In the first place, the terms are express that the expense of removing the wreck "shall be repaid by the owner of the same." The construction contended for appears to me to give no effect to these precise words. If all that was intended was that the expenses were to be paid out of the proceeds of the wreck, why were these words inserted, followed as they are by the words, "and the harbour master may detain and sell." Moreover, this power is expressed to be for "securing expenses," and the power to sell is on "non-payment on demand."

The truth is, that the contention of the appellants makes the latter words of the section alone operative, and gives no more effect to the words "shall be repaid by the owner" than if they had been omitted from the enactment. But this is not all; the latter part of the enactment, which it is said provides the only remedy, is not co-extensive with the earlier provisions. Authority is given to remove any wreck "or other obstruction," and also any floating timber which impedes the navigation. The expense of removing any such wreck, obstruction, or floating timber is to be repaid by the owner of the same; but power is only given to detain and sell such "wreck or floating timber." The word "obstruction" is omitted. Why the power was not extended to other obstructions than wrecks and floating timber is a matter of speculation. It may have been a mere slip, but it would scarcely be legitimate to construe the enactment on the assumption that it was so. There can be no doubt that it is just as explicitly enacted in the case of any other obstruction as in the case of a wreck that the expense shall be repaid by the owner, and yet, if the construction contended for by the appellants were to prevail the conclusion must either be that no means were provided for enforcing the liability in terms imposed, or that because no remedy was provided a personal debt was created in the case of an obstruction other than a wreck, but not in the case of a wreck, although the language as to repayment is identical in the two cases. I do not say that this is conclusive, but it adds to the difficulty of acceding to the interpretation insisted upon by the appellants. For the reasons I have given I do not see any way to differ from the courts below in holding that the terms of s. 56 do create a debt in respect of which an action may be maintained against the owner.

But then arises the question: Who is the owner within the meaning of the statute? The Court of Appeal, in Eglinton v. Norman (1), held that it was the person who was the owner at the time the obstruction occurred, and the right of the harbour master, therefore, to remove it accrued. They considered that, although the right of the harbour master to remove it was only inchoate, the rights of all parties were then irrevocably fixed, and that it mattered not what change afterwards took place in the ownership of a wreck. The words of the section do not expressly point out who is the owner referred to, and if the section had been held to apply only to cases where the obstruction came about by the default of the owner there would be much to be said for the view thus adopted. But, inasmuch as the section ex hypothesi applies even where there is no such default, I do not see any a priori reason for holding that the rights of the parties are then fixed. It is obvious that some time might elapse before the removal of the wreck which became an obstruction was determined on by the harbour master, and that a change of ownership might occur in the interval. When I examine the language of the section it appears to me to point, not to ownership at the time the obstruction is created, but to ownership at the time the expense of removing it is incurred. The expenses are to be repaid by the owner. The harbour master may sell the wreck on non-payment of such expenses on demand. And lastly, if the wreck is sold, and the proceeds exceeds the expenses, the overplus is to be returned to the owner on demand. This can scarcely mean the person who was the owner at the time the obstruction was caused, but must surely be intended to refer to the person whose wreck was disposed of and removed.

In the present case it seems clear that before the time when the expenses were incurred by the respondents, the appellants had abandoned the vessel as derelict on the high seas, without any intention of resuming possession or ownership. They had also given notice of abandonment to the underwriters. It is unnecessary to determine whether the underwriters are to be treated as the owners within the meaning of the statute; it is enough to say that I do not think the appellants can on its true construction be regarded as having, at the time the expenses were incurred, been owners and liable to repay them. I have, like some of the noble and learned

A Lords who took part in the decision of River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (2), felt the greatest doubt and difficulty as to the proper mode of dealing with this case. The history of the statute (of which the section in question forms part) is pointed out by LORD BLACKBURN in that case. Many of the sections probably had their origin in the desire of the authorities who promoted Harbour Acts to secure adequate protection for their undertakings, and may have been adopted by the legislature

B without sufficiently careful consideration of the interests of other persons, and the liability which might with justice be imposed upon them. I cannot profess that the conclusion at which I have arrived is completely satisfactory to my own mind; but I think it is better to adhere in such a case as closely as one can to settled rules of construction, leaving any necessary changes in the law to be effected by the legislature rather than to attempt by a strained and violent construction to

C arrive at what, after all, may be very halting justice.

A subordinate point was raised in this case. The respondents incurred certain expenses in lighting and watching the wreck under the Removal of Wrecks Act, 1877 [repealed by Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (23 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 395), of which see ss. 530-534 relating to the removal of wrecks]. They applied the proceeds derived from the sale of the wreck towards the expenses

D incurred by them, both under the Act of 1847, and the later statute. They then sued for the balance of the expenses. It was contended that they were bound to apply the moneys received pro rata to the expenses incurred under the two statutes. This contention was repelled by the courts below, and I see no reason to differ from the views expressed on this point. For the reasons I have given, I think the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed, and judgment entered for

E the defendants, with costs. The respondents must pay the costs here and in the courts below.

LORD WATSON.—This appeal depends upon the construction of a single section in the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847. The respondents, in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1847 and by the

F Removal of Wrecks Act, 1877, between Jan. 15 and June 4, 1892, spent £1,128 3s. 4d. in removing or dispersing the wreck of the steamship Crystal, which had been sunk by a collision on Jan. 7 within the approaches to the river and harbour of Tyne, and constituted a dangerous obstruction of vessels using the port. Their outlay was recouped to the extent of £331 16s. 11d. by sales of cargo taken from the wreck, the amount of their expenditure being thus reduced to £796 6s. 5d. The

G appellants were owners of the Crystal at the time when she was wrecked. On Jan. 8 they gave notice of her abandonment as a total constructive loss to their underwriters, who subsequently paid them the full amount of their insurances upon that footing. On Jan. 8 they received a notice that they would be held liable for the expenses which the respondents were about to incur, in reply to which they intimated that they had already abandoned the vessel as a wreck in the

H open sea. The respondents now claim payment of the balance of £796 6s. 5d. from the appellants as being the owners of the wreck of the Crystal, and they have obtained judgment in their favour both in the Admiralty Division and in the Court of Appeal.

The claim thus made and sustained has admittedly no warrant in the Act of 1877. It is based exclusively upon s. 56 of the Act of 1847, which provides that

I "The harbour master may remove any wreck or other obstruction to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the approaches to the same, and also any floating timber which impedes the navigation thereof; and the expense of removing any such wreck, obstruction or floating timber shall be repaid by the owner of the same, and the harbour master may detain such wreck or floating timber for securing the expenses, and on non-payment of such expenses, on demand, may sell such wreck or floating timber, and out of the proceeds of such sale pay such expenses, rendering the overplus, if any, to the owner on demand."

The argument of the appellants was directed to these two points only. They maintained, in the first place, that the section does not attach to the owner any personal liability for expenses, and in the second place that, if it does, they neither are, nor were at any time, the owners of the wreck of the Crystal within the meaning of the section. It does not admit of doubt that, if the appellants can establish either of these propositions, the judgments appealed from must be reversed. I do not find it necessary to enter upon the consideration of the first of these points, because I am satisfied that the argument of the appellants upon the second of them ought to prevail. Had it not been necessary to decide the first point, I could not, as at present advised, have differed from the opinion expressed by the Lord Chancellor. I cannot agree with the able judgment of the Irish court in The Edith (3), and I am unable to appreciate the bearing of River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (2) upon the facts of the present case. I agree with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that their abandonment of the sunken ship in the open sea sine animo recuperandi had divested the appellants of all proprietary interest in the wreck before the respondents commenced operations with a view to its removal. That state of the facts necessarily gives rise to the question, whether the expression "the owner" of the wreck, as it occurs in s. 56, is meant to designate the owner of the ship at the time when she goes to the bottom of the sea or the owner of the wreck at and during the time of its removal.

GORELL BARNES, J., and the learned judges of the Appeal Court accepted as binding upon this point the decision of the Court of Appeal in Eglinton v. Norman (1). In that case it was laid down by the present Master of the Rolls (BRETT, L.J.), with the concurrence of LORD COLERIDGE, and a very hesitating assent by LORD BRAMWELL, that when a ship sinks in such a position as to cause obstruction to a harbour or its approaches, a right to remove it at the expense of the then owner at once accrues to the harbour authorities, and cannot be affected by any subsequent change or loss of ownership. I do not think it is reasonably possible to arrive at that conclusion except by holding that the legislature, in using the words "owner of the wreck," meant thereby to designate the owner of the ship at the time when she became a wreck. If that had been the intention of the legislature, nothing could have been easier than to give it expression. But the intention of the legislature can only be gathered from the language actually employed, and I am of opinion that the construction adopted by the learned judges of the Appeal Court, in Eglinton v. Norman (1), is inadmissible. The only thing which the harbour master under the section in question has authority to deal with is the wreck, and not the ship; and the only charges which, in any view, he can have a right to recover are those which may be duly incurred by him for the purpose and in the course of its removal.

It is clear, to my mind, that prima facie the owner of the wreck must be the person to whom the wreck belongs during the time when the harbour master chooses to exercise his statutory powers. That appears to me to be the primary and natural meaning of the words. It may, of course, be displaced by force of the context. But I can find nothing in the context to suggest that the words were intended to have any other than their natural meaning. On the contrary, the direction in the end of the section to the effect that the harbour master, after selling the materials of the wreck in order to pay the expenses which he has incurred, shall account to the owner for any overplus, clearly indicates that the owner is the person to whom these materials belonged. Being of opinion that the respondents have failed to show that the appellants were owners of the wreck of the Crystal within the meaning of the section, I concur in the judgment which has been proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—The decision of this appeal depends on the construction to be given to s. 56 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Act, 1847, the terms of which have been stated by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me. The contention of the appellants substantially raises two questions upon this

A section. They insist (i) that no personal liability is cast upon "the owner" for the expenses claimed; and (ii) that, no matter how that may be, they are not the "owners" who are chargeable. The statute does not apply to all harbours, docks, and piers, for the first section enacts that it shall

B "extend only to such harbours, docks, and piers as shall be authorised by any Act of Parliament hereafter to be passed, which shall declare that this Act be incorporated therewith."

C The statute was so incorporated by the Tyne Improvement Acts, and thus the questions are raised. Had the wreck occurred in or near any harbour where such incorporation had not taken place, it is not suggested that the appellants could have been made liable. It is admitted that they could not be responsible at common law, and, therefore, the whole case turns upon the construction of this section which creates this new responsibility. There should be clear words to create any such liability, and in construing the section the rule must be borne in mind that where the liability is a liability not existing at common law, but for the first time imposed by the statute, then, if the remedy is also prescribed by the statute, the party must pursue that remedy.

D Before taking the words of the section it is well to consider the nature and character of this personal liability sought under this section for the first time to be imputed to an "owner." It is asserted that, although he be not negligent, although his master and crew may have shown the most splendid seamanship and the most heroic courage, he is personally liable for the expense of the removal of the wreck of his ship, if it causes an obstruction to the harbour or navigation.

E The wreck may be caused by the act of God, by the default of the pilot he is compelled by law to employ, by the absence of the very buoys and lighthouses which the harbour authority is itself bound to provide, but no qualification of the owner's liability is suggested. Smugglers or mutineers may have wrecked the ship and make it an obstruction, but the possibility of an exception is not admitted. It is asserted that this personal liability is unlimited in amount, and that no

F matter how small the value of the vessel, or how worthless the cargo, the "owner" must answer to his last farthing for these expenses. The cost of removal might be twenty times the value of the ship, and the payment of that cost might drive the "owner" into bankruptcy; but that is not a consideration to be noted. It may be even asserted that the liability is not guarded by any limit of time or space, that the wreck might sink, causing no obstruction outside a harbour, yet

G years after it might by the action of storms, or wind, or tide be shifted to a position where it became an obstruction, when this liability would attach. In fact it is contended that under all circumstances, no matter what the conduct, or what the amount involved, "the owner" is personally liable, and that he is so made for the first time under this section.

H It is not too much to expect that a section imposing such a tremendous liability should be in clear terms. The section is not clear; its interpretation is difficult, its language is infelicitous, but it can be made to work smoothly and without difficulty if the contention of the respondents is rejected and that of the appellants adopted. In my opinion, no personal liability is created by the section. The first object of the section was to give power to the harbour master to remove the wreck or obstruction. Then if the owner repays the expenses he may take away

I his property. If he does not repay the expenses, the harbour master is given his remedy, the power of detaining the wreck with the further power of selling on non-payment of the expenses after demand. Then it is finally provided that, after payment of the expenses out of the proceeds, the surplus, if any, is to be rendered to the owner "on demand." The words "the expense . . . shall be repaid by the owner" cannot be taken alone. The whole section must be read together. The ship and its proceeds on sale were, as far as they went, to provide the fund for the expense; and accordingly, while the section provides for handing over the surplus to the owner, there are no words saying that he is to make good the deficiency. It is not suggested that there is anything in the subsequent Removal of Wrecks Act, 1877, to support the respondents' construction of this s. 56. Yet if that construction is correct, we should expect to find the same liability in s. 4 of the later Act. These Acts deal with the same subject-matter, and it may well be that the Act of 1877 may supply some interpretation of this earlier provision. It is at all events worthy of note that the common law antecedent to the Act of 1847, and the statute law subsequent to that date, impose no personal liability of any kind for this expense. A

The learned judges in the courts below followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Eglinton v. Norman (1). Only one of the judges of the Court of Appeal in the present case said that he would have decided the same way, and DAVEY, L.J., said that whenever the case was re-considered, the argument of counsel for the present appellants was worthy of the greatest consideration. On this point, therefore, one cannot decide in favour of the appellants without impeaching the authority of Eglinton v. Norman (1). I should infer from the report of that case that several of the arguments by which your Lordships have been aided had not been brought prominently before the court, and this is noted expressly in his judgment by A. L. SMITH, L.J. That case, however, decides on this section that a personal liability was attached to the "owner," and for the reasons I have already stated, I have arrived at an opposite conclusion, and with great deference to the learned judges who took part in that decision, and to the Lord Chancellor, I do not think it can be supported. The Edith (3), decided on similar words in another statute, is entirely opposed to the construction which would impose any personal responsibility on the owner, and PALLES, C.B., there strongly relied upon the argument that, when a new right is created by a section, and there is a remedy given in that section, that is the only remedy which is given at all. C

River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (2) has also been relied upon by the appellants as shaking the authority of Eglinton v. Norman (1). It cannot be relied upon as a direct authority, being upon a different section of the statute; but I think it has a bearing upon the case, and can be usefully considered in connection with some of the arguments addressed to your Lordships. That case turns upon s. 74 of the Act of 1874, which says that F

"the owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber to the harbour, dock or pier, or the quays or works connected therewith."

These words would appear to be clear and unqualified, and are certainly far more clear and unqualified than those of s. 56. But when an owner who had been in no default was sought to be made liable under its terms a large majority of this house declined to recognise his liability. I concur with the Lord Chancellor that no very clear principle can be extracted from the judgments, but I, at all events, gather that, although one noble and learned Lord was unable to see any way of escape from the apparently clear words of the section, the other noble and learned Lords decided that the section must be held to refer to something in which man was concerned, and not the casualties brought about by the act of God. The opinion of LORD BLACKBURN shows in every word the doubt and difficulty he felt in arriving at this conclusion. He points out (2 App. Cas. at p. 770) that G

"The shipowner, if liable at all under this statute, is personally liable to his last farthing for the whole damage, however great, and however small may be the value of the ship"; I and, again (ibid. at pp. 770, 772),

"before deciding that the construction of the statute is such as to work this hardship, we ought to be sure that such is the construction, more particularly when the hardship affects not only one individual but a whole class. After much hesitation and doubt I am not prepared to say that this judgment should be reversed."

A I am disposed to think that, if the noble and learned Lords who decided River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (2) had also been called upon to decide the present case, they would have held that a shipowner was no more personally liable under s. 56 than under s. 74. It would have been difficult for them to hold an owner personally liable under the rather cumbrous words of s. 56, when they had just exonerated him from such liability under the much clearer and more absolute words of s. 74. In so holding, a consistent and workable construction is given to both sections, and none of the startling consequences, to which I have adverted at an earlier stage of my remarks, would have resulted.

On the second question, as to who is the owner under the statute, I might possibly have felt some difficulty if I had come to a different conclusion on the first point. If the owner was personally liable, an attempt might be made to argue against a construction under which he would be allowed to evade his liability, after the wreck and after the obstruction, by a mere assignment. The arguments and judgments in Eglinton v. Norman (1) are largely conversant with this question of the owner, and I think there may have been possibly some difference of opinion as to the time when he was to be ascertained with a view to the suggested liability. Sir H. James, for the plaintiff, argued that the owner at the time of the casualty was the owner under the statute, and this view was accepted by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and BRAMWELL, L.J., and BRETT, L.J., held that the owner was the owner at the time the wreck became an obstruction; but it is not easy to know whether there was any real difference of opinion between them and the Chief Justice. I agree with my noble and learned friends who have preceded me that the owner referred to in the section is the owner at the time the harbour master incurred the expense; and, concurring as I do generally in the arguments they have expressed in support of this conclusion, I see no good purpose in repeating or attempting to add to them. In my opinion, also the judgment should be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—Apart from the provisions of s. 56 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, it seems to be clear that, according to English law the owner of a shipwrecked and sunken vessel which has become an obstruction to navigation through no fault on the owner's part, and of which he has lost or relinquished the possession, management, and control, is not under any obligation to remove it, or under any liability to pay or contribute to the payment of the expenses of its removal.

G The subject was much discussed in an elaborate judgment by MAULE, J., in the Common Pleas (Brown v. Mallett (4)). The principles laid down in that judgment were approved in the Exchequer in White v. Crisp (5), and those two authorities have been followed in a case in the Privy Council (The Utopia (6)). MAULE, J., says (5 C.B. at pp. 618, 619):

H “Where the navigation . . . has become obstructed by a vessel which has sunk and been lost to the owner without any fault of his, the public inconvenience of the obstruction is one in respect of which the owner differs from the rest of the public only in having sustained a private calamity in addition to his share of a public convenience, and this difference does not appear to be any reason for throwing on him the cost of remedying or mitigating the evil. In the case of R. v. Watts (7), LORD KENYON held that the owner of a ship sunk in the Thames by accident or misfortune, without his default or misconduct, was not liable to an indictment for not removing the obstruction. It was contended for the prosecution in that case, that, although the defendant was not punishable for causing the nuisance, it having arisen from accident, it was his duty to remove it; but the learned judge answered that perhaps the expense of removal might have amounted to more than the whole value of the property. The same reason would apply in the case of an indictment for not giving notice by signal, or taking other means to prevent damage from a sunken vessel; the expense of doing so might, and probably would, be greater than any private benefit which the owner might derive from it; and whether it were greater or not, the reason seems to be the same for not throwing on the owner any special share in the consequence of a public misfortune with which he had no particular concern, except that it arose out of a private disaster which he had innocently suffered."

Then he adds that, in the case of such impediments to navigation arising out of unavoidable accidents,

"the proper rule seems to be that the expense of removing or diminishing the danger arising from them should be defrayed by those who would be benefited by such a measure."

It seems to me that legislation contravening the principles and reversing the rule laid down by MAULE, J., would be legislation that might be described, not inaptly, as barbarous. At the same time there would be nothing unreasonable in making the owner, whose private misfortune has caused a public nuisance, pay or contribute to the expense of its removal, if and so far as he derives a benefit from the operation.

With these general remarks I approach the consideration of s. 56. The question seems to me to be this: Does that section throw upon the owner of a vessel which has become a wreck, and as such is an obstruction to navigation, the whole expense of its removal in every event and under all circumstances, or does it only throw the expense upon him if and so far as he is specially benefited by the removal? The result of the one construction, if it be admissible, would be fair and reasonable; the result of the other would be repugnant to justice, and in many cases, as LORD ASHBOURNE has pointed out, cruel and unreasonable in the extreme. The first observation that occurs to one is that this section is found in a collection or group of clauses which are headed with the words:

"And with respect to the appointment of harbour masters, dock masters, and pier masters, and their duties, be it enacted as follows":

LORD WENSLEYDALE, speaking of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which is framed in a similar manner, said:

"An Act so penned cannot be read as a continuous enactment would be: various clauses relating to each separate subject are collected under various heads with an appropriate heading to each class, which must apply to the whole of that class of which it is the heading"; and he adds that the effect is the same as if the heading had been repeated at the head of each section: Eastern Counties and London and Blackwall Rail. Cos. v. Marriage (8), 9 H.L.Cas. at p. 69. The section, therefore, must be read in connection with the general heading. So read, it purports to be concerned primarily with the duties of harbour masters, dock masters, and pier masters. That is the scope of the section, and its proper province. The general heading supplies the key to the enactment. There is no indication that the enactment was intended to effect a serious alteration in the law to the prejudice and detriment of individuals. It rather seems to be indicated that nothing more was intended than to confer upon the harbour master, acting in the public interest, power to do on behalf of the owner that which might be done by the owner himself in his own interest, with less regard, perhaps, to the interest of the public.

Then the section says that the expense of removing the wreck "shall be repaid by the owner of the same." The word "repaid" again rather looks as if the framers of the enactment had in their minds repayment by one on whose behalf the operation was conducted. But that is a very slight indication of intention, because it may perhaps point to the circumstance that in the majority of cases the work would be done, not by the harbour master himself and his servants, but by persons whose trade and business it is to do such work, whom he would have

A to pay in the first instance. The words "shall be repaid by the owner" are the great difficulty in the case. I am unable to construe the section as confining the right of the harbour master in respect of repayment to payment out of the proceeds of the wreck (i) because that construction in reality gives no effect whatever to the words, "shall be repaid by the owner"; and (ii) because such a construction would give an unfair advantage to the owner. An owner with a keen eye to his
 B own interest would never think of offering repayment unless the value of the wreck greatly exceeded the cost of removal. He would wait until the harbour master puts the wreck up for sale, and then he would probably have the opportunity of buying it for an old song; at the outside the only risk he would run would be the risk of having to bear the expenses of the sale. I do not question the rule that where a new right is created and a remedy given by one and the same enactment,
 C that remedy is the only remedy to be pursued. But I do not see how that rule can be applied to s. 56 so as to limit the reimbursement of the harbour master to the proceeds of the sale of the wreck, because it seems to me that according to the true construction of the section, the harbour master has two remedies—a personal remedy against the owner as well as a remedy against the proceeds of the sale. I am, therefore, of opinion that the section does impose upon the owner
 D of a wreck removed by the harbour master under the powers thereby conferred, the duty of paying the expenses of removal.

But this does not settle the question between the parties to this litigation. In order to make anyone liable the wreck must be "removed" within the meaning of that word as used in the section; and after all the only person who can be made liable is the owner of the wreck. In the present case I do not think that there
 E has been a removal for which anybody can be made liable; and I am further of opinion that the owners of the Crystal before she was wrecked are not the owners of the wreck within the meaning of s. 56. It seems to me that the removal contemplated by s. 56 is removal in the interest and on behalf of the owner as well as in the interest and for the benefit of the public. To entitle the harbour master to repayment under s. 56, it is I think incumbent upon him to remove the obstruction
 F in such a manner that at the conclusion of the operation it is substantially in the same plight and condition as it was at the commencement, or at any rate with some regard to the interest of the owner, whose interest I think the enactment meant to be regarded. What has the harbour master done here? He has "dispersed the wreck by explosives." That no doubt is a very complete and effectual sort of removal, but it is not, I think, the sort of removal which is contemplated
 G by the section. It is to be observed that under this section the harbour master is not given power to destroy. Another statute was passed to give that power. Here there was not removal, but total destruction. Not one scrap or atom of the wreck was salvaged; not a single penny is brought into the account as the produce of the sale of any part of the wreck. It sounds to me like a grim joke to ask the owner, where there is an owner, to pay for the expense of annihilating his own
 H property because he is chargeable by statute—and fairly chargeable, with the cost of its removal.

Then comes the question: Are the persons who were the owners of the Crystal at the time of the accident which caused the wreck the owners of the wreck within the meaning of the section? I lay out of consideration what took place between the owners and the underwriters. I will deal only with what took place between the
 I harbour authority and the owners. On Jan. 8, 1892, the Tyne Improvement Commissioners gave notice to the owners of the Crystal that the vessel, which was then lying sunk at the harbour entrance, was an obstruction to navigation, and that if the obstruction was allowed to continue, they would on the expiration of seven days proceed to take possession of, remove, and, if necessary, destroy the whole of the vessel. On Jan. 12, before the expiration of the seven days, the owners replied by letter that, the steamer being a wreck in the open sea, they had abandoned her as such, and the commissioners must look to the savings of the wreck for any outlay they might have.

It appears to me that by that letter the owners declared that they had abandoned all rights of property and given up all interest in the vessel. Thereupon I think they ceased to be owners within the meaning of s. 56. They had lost possession of the vessel already; all that remained to them was the property in the vessel, that is to say, the right to re-take or resume possession of her. This right they abandoned as plainly and equivocally as it was possible for them to do, and they abandoned it before the commissioners began their operations or even took possession. They disowned the wreck. For the purposes of s. 56 it is not, I think, necessary to inquire whether goods designedly abandoned by their owner under such circumstances that no wrong is done to anybody by the abandonment become thereupon bona vacantia and "derelict" in the proper sense of the word, or whether, as the author of DOCTOR AND STUDENT asserts, the property still remains in the owner notwithstanding the abandonment. The commissioners appear to be in a dilemma. They have destroyed the wreck. Section 56 does not authorise destruction. If they take their stand on the Removal of Wrecks Act, 1877, they cannot under it charge the owner with their expenses. If they do not rely on the powers of that Act their action must be attributed to the license or authority which the notice of abandonment conferred, and then their action would have the effect of divesting the owner of the Crystal of the property (if any) which still remained in them after their notice of abandonment.

If the view which I venture to present be correct, s. 56 is a reasonable enactment. Where the owner of the vessel which is wrecked gives the harbour authority to understand that he retains his right of property in the wreck, and they remove it so as to be in a position to return it to him substantially in the same condition in which it was when they commenced operations, they can charge him, I think, with the cost of removal though the cost may exceed the value of the thing removed. Where he tells them plainly that he has abandoned the wreck, they may deal with it as they please, without regard to him; but they cannot make him liable for their expenditure. The defects, such as they were, in s. 56 are remedied by the Removal of Wrecks Act, 1877. Under that Act the harbour authorities may destroy the wreck if they think fit, although there be an owner claiming an interest in it, and they may do the work of destruction without regard to the owner's interest. I am unable to agree with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Eglinton v. Norman (1), and I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the present case, which is founded on it, should be reversed, and the action dismissed with costs.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur in the judgment proposed. The facts of this case have been so fully stated by your Lordships who have preceded me, that it is quite unnecessary that I should repeat them. The defendants are under no common law liability of any kind. Their liability is the subject of express enactment—s. 56 of the Act of 1847. Does that enactment make the defendants liable for the expenses of removing the wreck under the circumstances of this case? I am of opinion that it does not. It appears to me that it is only in the case of an owner—that is, of a person remaining in the position of owner, and in possession of the wreck—that any personal liability would attach to him; that if he abandon the wreck, or if the harbour authority take possession of the wreck and sell, the person who had been owner remains so no longer, except for the purpose of getting any surplus over the expenses out of the proceeds of the sale by the harbour authority, and incurs no personal liability. If the harbour authority did not arrest and detain the offending obstruction (in this case the wreck), and supposing that the owner remains owner, it may be that he would be liable, as he chooses to keep the offending obstruction, and, consequently, should be held liable to pay the expense of the removal of what he keeps as his property; but when he has informed the harbour authority that he disclaimed any property in the wreck, the only remedy for the harbour authority is to sell the wreck. The ordinary relation of debtor and creditor, from which an obligation to pay on request would be implied,

A is not created. The owner is in no default by himself or his servants; he abandons the property in the wreck, whereupon it becomes the subject which is to pay for the expense of its removal. The final clause of the section, while providing for the return of overplus, if any, does not proceed to say that any deficiency is to be made up by the owner. Where an action is intended, or distress intended to be empowered, the action or distress is directly given, as in ss. 48, 44 and 45.

Appeal allowed.

Maintenance of Action—Defence—Common interest in subject-matter of action—Legal, not sentimental, interest.

The defendant, H., advised T. to bring an action for libel against the plaintiffs, and provided all the funds for carrying it on. The libel complained of was contained in an article reflecting upon the character of T., and also upon the character and business of H., but the libels on H. did not form any part of the cause of T.'s action, nor was there any issue raised in that action as to H.'s character or conduct. In that action the present plaintiffs obtained a verdict, but were unable to recover any of their costs from T. The plaintiffs thereupon sued H. and other defendants in the present action to recover damages for maintenance.

Held: the defendant H. had no such common interest in T.'s action for libel as would justify his maintenance of that action, and he was, therefore, liable in damages.

Per LOPES, L.J.: To justify interference by one person in an action brought by another the one must have some interest which is recognised by law in the subject-matter of the action, and, in my opinion, it must be a legal, and not merely a sentimental, interest in the result of the action.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of HAWKINS, J., at the trial of the action without a jury, reported [1894] 2 Q.B. 897.

The plaintiffs, proprietors of a newspaper called the "Electrical Review," brought an action claiming damages for maintenance against the defendants Cornelius Bennett Harness and the Medical Battery Co., Ltd., of which company Mr. Harness was, at the times hereinafter mentioned, the managing director. The Medical Battery Co. was incorporated for the purpose of carrying out the treatment of diseases by means of electric and magnetic appliances. They manufactured and dealt in the apparatus suitable for such treatment, and as a part of their establishment they founded and maintained an institute called The Electric and Zander Institute, with Mr. Harness as its head. In January, 1892, the plaintiffs published in the "Electrical Review" an article by way of protest against certain apparatus, contrivances, and electric belts which had been publicly exhibited by the company at the Crystal Palace, as being constructed in direct opposition to the laws of electricity, and in July and September in the same year the plaintiffs published other articles highly disparaging to the institute and to Mr. Harness, its president. In respect of these publications the Medical Battery Co. brought an action for libel against the present plaintiffs on Sept. 23, 1892. The pleadings in that action were completed, but no notice of trial was ever given, and on April 28, 1893, it was discontinued. On September 23, 1892, another article had appeared in the "Electrical Review" commenting in very strong and adverse terms upon a report which had recently been written and published by Dr. Herbert Tibbits, testifying to the great value of the institute, the efficiency of its apparatus and appliances, and the Harness Electropathic Belt, and reflecting upon the character and conduct of Tibbits in connection with that report, and also upon the Zander Institute and its appliances, and on the conduct of Harness as its manager and the vendor of the belts bearing his name. In respect of that article, Tibbits on Oct. 1, 1892, commenced an action of libel in his own name against the present plaintiffs. That action came on for trial before MATHEW, J., on Feb. 15, 1893, and resulted in a verdict for the defendants in that action with costs. These costs Tibbits was unable to pay, and the present action was brought against the present defendants to recover them as damages sustained by the plaintiffs in defraying the expenses of their defence to Tibbits' action, upon the ground that the defendants unlawfully maintained Tibbits in bringing and prosecuting his action. The maintenance charged consisted in Harness's suggesting to Tibbits to commence his action, and in employing a solicitor nominated by him to issue the writ and conduct the case at his, Harness', sole expense. C D E F G H

In giving judgment HAWKINS, J., said: "I have to ask myself, what is the 'thing in the plea or suit,' or the 'thing in variance' in an action, a common interest in which, with a plaintiff or defendant, justifies maintenance of such action or defence? Surely it must be that which the plaintiff claims as the subject-matter and object of his action, that which he will attain as the result of success in it. Whether such action be in detinue for goods, for disturbance of a right or any other imaginable grievance, the common interest in such subject-matter must be in the attainment of such success. It must be something far beyond a mere wish for the success of the suit; it must be more than a mere hope or expectancy that maintainer may, by upholding one of the parties, do great service to a I

A friend, or that he may thereby acquire such control and influence over its conduct that he may turn it to his own advantage. All such hopes and expectancies would amount to nothing in the way of justification unless he had a real interest in the subject-matter of the suit, or 'the thing in variance' in it. If such hopes or expectancies, without real interest in the matter, would suffice, maintenance would soon become very common.

B "I have used the phrases 'common interest in the subject-matter of the suit' and 'common interest in the thing at variance' because there is a difference between the 'subject-matter of the suit,' which means the very thing to be recovered in the action, and 'the thing in variance.' For instance, the action may be brought by any person directly and ostensibly in respect of the interference by the defendant of a right of way or of common in which the maintainer has a like interest.

C Maintenance in such a case would be clearly justified because of common interest in the subject-matter. Or the action may be brought to recover damages for a grievance; for instance, an assault in which damages could only be recovered for the trespass on the person of the plaintiff, in which there could be no common interest, and yet in the course of the case an issue might be raised in the determination of which another might have clearly a common interest to support or otherwise.

D I illustrate it thus: A. sues B. for a common assault. B. pleads simply Not Guilty. C. would not be justified in maintaining A.'s action, because he could have no common interest in it. But if B. pleaded a justification that A. was trespassing upon his land, and refused to go off it, and so he laid hands on him and put him off, and to this plea A. replied he was on B.'s land exercising a right of way, common to himself and C., this would be a thing in variance, and

E C. would clearly be justified in maintaining A.'s right, as being one in which he and A. had a common interest.

"Let me now deal with the present case. No doubt the article containing the libel complained of by Dr. Tibbits contained also libellous imputations upon the defendant Harness and his institution; but the libels upon the defendant Harness did not form any part of the cause of action, nor was there any issue raised as

F to his character or conduct. Harness' character, and the worth of his appliances, it is true, might form a prominent topic for counsel to comment adversely upon; and he might naturally feel deeply interested, in the sense of being anxious to have them met and refuted, and the utility of his belts and appliances established before the world. This is the condition of many persons not parties to suits, whose character and actions are unavoidably made the subject of very free comment during the progress of a cause; but this does not constitute such a common

G interest in the suit as to justify maintenance. In Tibbits' character or success, so far as he was concerned, Harness had no legal interest, and his own character and conduct could neither be judicially condemned nor justified, and any issues raising questions touching them would have been immaterial. In no proper sense, therefore, could the libel on Mr. Harness be treated as the matter in variance

H in Tibbits' action. Tibbits' character alone was the subject-matter of the action, and his right to maintain his action was the sole matter in variance. Throughout the pleadings in that action the innuendoes were in the statement of claim limited to Dr. Tibbits, and there is no justification, except so far as regards Tibbits, and the substantial defence was that, so far as Tibbits was concerned, the article was fair and bona fide comment and criticism of a published book and pamphlet and of

I proceedings of public interest, and upon this defence alone the verdict was for the defendants, the now plaintiffs.

"I know it may be said that it is hard that when a man's character is attacked he should not be allowed to support by his money the cause of a man who in defending his own character must of necessity to some extent support that of the other who is attacked with him. It may be so. I can only say, in my opinion, to allow a person to assist another in litigation upon matters which do not immediately and directly concern him would lead to more strife and inconvenience than could possibly result from the present law that no man may intermeddle to support or defend a suit which, in the result, and by the judgment in it, can finally determine nothing which he desires to have determined, or which is not practically in issue. In the present case, however, I am pressed by no such feelings of hardship. For in the action brought by the Medical Battery Co. against Alabaster and others, to which I referred at the commencement of this judgment, the defendant Harness had a full opportunity of completely vindicating not only the character of the company but also his own. He thought fit, however, to abandon that action, for he discontinued it on April 28, 1893, some months before Tibbits' action was tried, preferring to shelter himself under the wing of Dr. Tibbits. And even in Tibbits' action he did not do that which he might have done, namely, make himself co-plaintiff with Tibbits; had he done so he would have entitled himself to all the advantages and opportunities of clearing his own character, as he would have had had he brought a separate action: R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1, and Booth v. Briscoe (1). This would have given him a common interest in the action, which I think he had not under the circumstances.

"This was not a case in which a joint action by Tibbits and Harness could have been maintained. Had it been so perhaps each might have maintained the other. This was merely an action in which two persons being libelled in one article each might separately have recovered damages as though each had brought a separate action. But of course, if Harness had so joined as plaintiff, he would have been liable for costs in the event of failure. By acting as he did, although he made himself liable for Tibbits' costs, he took the chance of any advantage he might derive from the action, but saved himself from liability to the defendant for costs in the ordinary course. I know it is not necessary to establish conclusively that a joint interest in the action virtually existed, and that it is sufficient to justify the defendant in maintaining Tibbits' action if on reasonable grounds he bona fide believed he had such interest, that is, that he reasonably believed in the existence of that state of things which, if true would in law, would have justified him in maintaining the action. His erroneous belief as to what in law would justify him, and his bona fide belief in a state of things which would support his erroneous view of the law, would amount to nothing. I am of opinion he had no such bona fide belief; that if he had such belief, he had no reasonable grounds for it; that he merely availed himself of Tibbits' action to save himself from the evils of liability for the defendants' costs; and his conduct in all these respects was unlawful. For all these reasons I think the verdict ought to be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount of the taxed costs of their defence, to be taxed as between party and party."

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and F. Dodd for the defendants.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Eldon Bankes for the plaintiffs.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—This is a perfectly clear case. An action was brought against Harness to recover damages for the maintenance by him of an action brought by Tibbits against the present plaintiffs for a libel on himself. That is a personal action which concerns only the man who brings it; he cannot recover damages for injury to anyone else, only for injury to himself. It was proved clearly that the action was commenced through a meeting at the office of Harness's solicitor when it was arranged that the action should be brought by Tibbits for the libel upon Tibbits, that the solicitor should be Mr. Cridland, who was, however, to act under the directions of Harness's solicitors, and that Harness should pay all the expenses. It was clearly proved, therefore, that Harness maintained that action. He suggested to Tibbits that he should commence the action, and he employed a solicitor, nominated by himself, to issue the writ and conduct the case at his sole expense. That was an action which ought, according to LORD LOUGHBOROUGH, upon principles of public policy, to be brought by the plaintiff upon his own bottom: Wallis v. Duke of Portland (2). In this case Harness

A instigated the bringing of an action by Tibbits and maintained it, when it ought to have been brought by Tibbits upon his own bottom, and at his own expense. That action in point of law concerned Tibbits only, and Harness could not be a party to it. If the action of Tibbits were unsuccessful, that could not have a legal effect of any kind upon any right of Harness.

B Is, then, this case one in which Harness is liable for maintenance? This doctrine of maintenance has been discussed by LORD LOUGHBOROUGH; it appears in the YEAR BOOKS; it has got into all the textbooks; and in recent times it has been elaborately considered by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Bradlaugh v. Newdegate (3), and has been considered in other cases. It is not a question of moral right or wrong, or of natural justice or injustice. I cannot see that, apart from the specific law upon the subject, there is any harm in assisting another man's action.

C I can see that it may be contrary to public policy, for the courts may be inundated with actions and be blocked, and there may be much litigation commenced by persons who cannot pay the costs if they fail. The foundation of this law is, as stated by LORD LOUGHBOROUGH, that, upon grounds of public policy, a man must litigate upon his own bottom. If a man interferes in the suit of another in such a way as to pay the expenses, he is breaking the law against maintenance.

D From the earliest times some relaxation of the strictness of this rule was allowed, and some particular cases were specifically excluded in which such interference was excused, though by the strict law a man would be liable for maintenance. One exception was the case of a landlord assisting the suit of his tenant. There was also the case where assistance was given from charity, which was specifically allowed as an exception; and there may be others. If, however, a case does not come within these specific exceptions, it must be governed by the strict letter of the law. I will adopt here the rule given by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Bradlaugh v. Newdegate (3), where he says (11 Q.B.D. at p. 11):

F "But in all these cases the interest spoken of is an actual valuable interest in the result of the suit itself, either present, or contingent, or future, or the interest which consanguinity or affinity to the suitor gives to the man who aids him, or the interest arising from the connection of the parties, e.g., as master and servant, or that which charity and compassion give a man in behalf of a poor man who, but for the aid of his rich helper, could not assert his rights, or would be oppressed and overborne in his endeavour to maintain them."

G The case of a person being "overborne" is that which was put by LORD ABINGER, in Findon v. Parker (4), as an illustration; but I think that it has never occurred, and probably never will occur. Admitting, therefore, that the only recognised exceptions are those which are stated by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and being determined not to increase those exceptions, we must hold that this case is not within the exceptions. This, then, is as bad a case of maintenance as can well be.

H Because of some fancied interest in the matter Harness instigated the action, and the action was really his action. Although I have adopted the words of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., yet I think that the rule may be equally well expressed by saying that the person must have "an interest recognised by law" in the suit which he assists. This appeal must be dismissed.

I LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree with the judgment of HAWKINS, J., in this case. The defendant was guilty of maintenance of the worst kind beyond all question. It is said that this maintenance was justifiable. I think that maintenance has been well defined by LORD ABINGER, in Prosser v. Edmonds (5), where he says (1 Y. & C.Ex. at p. 497):

"No encouragement should be given to litigation by the introduction of parties to enforce those rights which others are not disposed to enforce."

In this case it is sought to justify the maintenance upon the ground that Harness had a common interest with Tibbits in the action. In my opinion, he had no such common interest as would justify his interference. To justify such interference, a man must have some interest which is recognised by law in "the thing which is in variance," by which I understand an interest in the subject-matter of the action then in issue between the parties; and, in my opinion, it must be a legal, and not merely a sentimental, interest in the result of the action. Can Harness make out that he had any such common interest in this action? In my opinion, he had not any such interest. There was no question between Harness and the defendants in that action, and no issue which affected him. If the law of maintenance is based upon grounds of public policy, it is impossible to say that it is not contrary to public policy for a man who cannot be liable for costs to be permitted to come in and assist another in an action like this. I can imagine nothing more contrary to public policy. There are exceptions recognised by law, such as cases of consanguinity, oppression, charity, and master and servant. These exceptions are well recognised, but I should be sorry to see other exceptions engrafted upon the rule. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—An action was brought by Tibbits to recover damages for a libel, and that action was brought at the instigation of Harness. It has been argued that questions might arise in that action which would affect Harness, and that it would be hard if he could not protect himself in that action. I will not attempt to give any definition of maintenance, because the general rule has been stated over and over again in the authorities. This case is clearly within the general rule. The difficulty arises because of the various exceptions which have been allowed by judicial decisions as defences when the general rule has been violated. These exceptions cannot be reduced into any general rule. Harness, however, contends that there is a general rule that there must be a mens rea in every case, that is, that it must be shown that the defendant in each case did what he thought to be wrong; and that he has a good defence if he believed that he was not doing wrong. I adopt the passages which have been read from the judgment of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., merely introducing what I think he meant, viz., that the defendant must bring the case within the general rule as to having a common interest, or within one of the decided exceptions. This is a clear and aggravated case of maintenance, and not within any of the exceptions. I doubt whether, in any case, the man who is himself the author of the litigation, can claim the benefit of any of the exceptions, when his only excuse is that a question may arise which will affect him.

The plaintiff took a ticket at Philadelphia for Liverpool, by the defendants' steamship Lord Gough, and went on board the next day. During the voyage she fell overboard, owing, as she alleged, to the defendants' servants not providing proper guard-rails to a gangway and not properly lighting it. Upon the upper part of the ticket, which was handed to her by the ticket clerk folded up so that no writing was visible unless she unfolded it, nothing being said to draw her attention to the conditions, were the words in large type: "Received in payment in full for steerage passage for one adult." Lower down, after some small print, were certain terms, printed in small type, one of which was as follows: "It is mutually agreed for the consideration aforesaid that this ticket is issued and accepted under the following conditions: (d) The company is not under any circumstances liable to an amount exceeding 100 dollars for loss of or injury to the passenger or his luggage." Across the conditions the name of the ship and other matters were printed in red ink, which partially obscured the printed conditions. The plaintiff having brought an action to recover damages for the personal injuries suffered by her, the defendants pleaded that they were relieved from liability by condition (d). The jury, in answer to questions, found that, while the plaintiff knew that there was printing on the ticket, she did not know it contained conditions relating to the contract of carriage, or that the defendants had not done what was reasonably sufficient to give her notice of the conditions.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.), affirming a decision of BRUCE, J., at the trial of the action at the Liverpool Assizes.

Pickford, Q.C. (Bigham, Q.C., with him), for the appellants.

J. Walton, Q.C., and Collingwood Hope, for the respondent, were not called on to address their Lordships.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The only question that arose on the trial of this action was whether the plaintiff was bound by certain conditions limiting the liability of the defendants who had engaged to carry her on the steamer from Philadelphia to Liverpool. The plaintiff paid her passage money and received her ticket from the defendants. On that ticket undoubtedly there were a great number of conditions detailed. The ticket began by stating that each passenger would be required to provide bedding and eating utensils, and then it continued: "It is mutually agreed for the consideration aforesaid that this ticket is issued and accepted upon the following conditions." There are a number of conditions, beginning at the letter (a) and going down to the letter (i). The condition in question was one under letter (d):

"The company is not under any circumstances liable to an amount exceeding 100 dollars for loss of or injury to the passenger or his luggage."

These questions were left to the jury: (i) "Did the plaintiff know that there was writing or printing on the ticket?" That question they answered in the affirmative. (ii) "Did she know that the writing or printing on the ticket contained conditions relating to the terms of the contract of carriage?" That they answered in the negative. (iii) "Did the defendants do what was reasonably sufficient to give the plaintiff notice of the conditions?" That they answered in the negative also.

These are questions which the majority of the Court of Appeal in Parker v. South Eastern Rail. Co. (1) pointed out by their judgment ought to be left to the jury. That was a case in its broad features very similar to this, inasmuch as the plaintiff there had deposited some luggage at the luggage office of the railway company and received in return for the deposit of the luggage a ticket on which there was printed: "See back," and on the back were certain conditions by which it was sought to limit the liability of the company. The majority of the Court of Appeal held that they could not say, as matter of law, that by reason of taking that ticket in exchange for the goods the plaintiff was bound by the conditions; that those were questions to be determined by the jury, and that upon their determination would depend the liability of the defendants.

The only question which now comes before this House is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury upon which they could properly find the answer which they gave to the last two questions. What are the facts, and the only facts, bearing upon this question which were proved before the jury? That the plaintiff paid the money for her passage for the voyage in question, and that she received this ticket handed to her folded up by the ticket clerk, so that no writing was visible unless she opened and read it. There are no facts beyond those. Nothing was said to draw her attention to the fact that this ticket contained any conditions; and the argument of the appellants is and must be that where there are no facts beyond those which I have stated, the defendants are entitled, as matter of law, to say that the plaintiff is bound by those conditions. That seems to me to be absolutely in the teeth of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Parker v.

A South Eastern Rail. Co. (1), with which I entirely agree, and it does not seem either to be consistent, when the case is carefully considered, with Henderson v. Stevenson (2) in your Lordships' house. I, therefore, move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

B LORD WATSON.—I concur. It appears to me that there was ample material for a finding by the jury on all these three issues, and I am at present inclined to think that they found rightly upon them all.

C LORD ASHBOURNE.—I also quite concur. The ticket in question in this case was for a steerage passenger, a class of people of the humblest description, many of whom have little education, and some of them none. I think, having regard to the facts here, the smallness of the type in which the alleged conditions were printed, the absence of any calling of attention to the alleged conditions, and the stamping in red ink across them, there was quite sufficient evidence to justify the learned judge in letting this case go to the jury.

D LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

Appeal from two orders of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.), reported [1891] 1 Q.B. 194, affirming two orders of the Queen's Bench Division (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and MATHEW, J.), the first making absolute a rule nisi for a writ of habeas corpus requiring the appellant, Dr. Barnardo, to bring up the body of an infant named John James Roddy, the illegitimate child of the respondent, Mrs. Mary McHugh, and the second appointing Mr. Walter Hussey Walsh guardian of the infant.

The facts are set out in the opinion of LORD HERSCHELL.

Finlay, Q.C., and W. Baker for the appellant.

Murphy, Q.C., J. Walton and Lankester for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

July 30, 1891. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I desire to adopt the view of the facts of this case that has been stated by LORD ESHER, M.R. The question which this House has to determine is whether or not, under the circumstances the appellant is entitled against the will of the mother to retain the child in his home. That question, as I have already intimated, does not raise the question of unlawful detention at all. It is the question of whose is the rightful guardianship, or at all events what order the court ought to make in respect of guardianship on the facts of this case. It is clear that the written agreement with the appellant cannot determine that question. It is equally clear that, but for the circumstance of the child being illegitimate, there would be no doubt what order should be made. The question is whether that circumstance is conclusive against the mother on her present application.

I doubt very much whether any absolute rule can be laid down; but in R. v. Nash, Re Carey (1), this very question came for decision before the Court of Appeal, and SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., appears to me to have pointed out the distinction between strict legal rights as to guardianship and the jurisdiction which a court of equity does, and always did, exercise in regard to such orders as are now in question. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., pointed out that that court is now governed by equitable rules, and that in equity regard was always had to the mother, the putative father, and the relations on the mother's side. Natural relationship was thus looked to with a view to the benefit of the child. He says (10 Q.B.D. at p. 456): "There is in such a case a sort of blood relationship, which, though not legal, gives the natural relations a right to the custody of the child." His Lordship, I think, did not mean an absolute right, but such a right as he had already described to be considered by a court of equity in making such orders. LORD MANSFIELD says much the same thing. In R. v. Felton and Wenman (2) on motion for an information against the defendants for taking away a bastard child from its mother, and delivering it to the father, a man of fortune,

A his Lordship said :

“Neither the putative father nor mother had the legal right of guardianship; and if the putative father, having an order of bastardy made on him to contribute to the maintenance of the child, has a mind to take the child and provide for it, the parish cannot insist on his paying towards the maintenance while in his custody; and that he thought in this case, where the justice had ordered the child to be delivered to the mother, he (the justice) had done wrong, the father being in good circumstances, and the mother poor; and that the circumstances of the parents should direct these cases.”

C LORD COTTENHAM, in his answer to the suggestion that a court of equity only interfered on behalf of infants where there was property in question, said he had no doubt about the jurisdiction to interfere, quite independently of property, and he drew this distinction :

D “Courts of law interfere by habeas for the protection of the person of anybody who is suggested to be improperly detained. This court [that is to say, a court of equity] interferes for the protection of infants, qua infants, by virtue of the prerogative which belongs to the Crown as parens patriæ, and the exercise of which is delegated to the Great Seal : ”

see Re Spence (3), 2 Ph. 252.

E It is clear further that the law has placed on the mother of an illegitimate child obligations which ought, and in my opinion do, bring them corresponding rights. Whether the right is, as LINDLEY, L.J., expresses it, a prima facie right to the custody of the child, or whether it be the settled view of the court of equity that the mother's wishes ought to be consulted, if she has not forfeited the right to be consulted by any misconduct of her own, seems to me to be immaterial to decide, since I am of opinion that no misconduct is established against this mother which disentitles her to exercise her right to be considered in respect of the custody of this child. I am, therefore, of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

G LORD HERSCHELL.—In this case the Queen's Bench Division, on Aug. 5, 1890, made absolute an order that a writ of habeas corpus should issue commanding the appellant to have the body of an infant called Roddy before the judge at chambers immediately after the receipt of the writ. It was ordered that the writ should lie in the office until further order, and that the respondent, Margaret McHugh, should be at liberty to apply to the judge in chambers for the appointment of a guardian. On Nov. 4, the court appointed Mr. Walsh to be the guardian of the child. Both these orders were affirmed by the Court of Appeal on Nov. 25.

H The circumstances which have given rise to the controversy appear to be these : In the year 1888 a lady, who was a district visitor connected with Emmanuel Church, applied to the appellant for the admission to his homes of a boy named John James Roddy, who attended the schools belonging to that church. The boy was the illegitimate son of the respondent by a man named Jones, with whom she cohabited for twenty years. A few years ago she married her present husband.

I On June 19, the boy was admitted into the home, the respondent signing an agreement to leave the child under the care of the managers for twelve years. Early in the year 1890, the appellant was required, in accordance with an authority signed by the respondent, to hand the child over to a person named by her, and, on his refusal to do so, the present proceedings were instituted.

The question principally discussed at your Lordships' bar was whether the mother of an illegitimate child has a legal right to its custody. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that she has no such right; while on the other side it was argued that her rights are the same as those which a father possesses with regard to his legitimate children. In the courts below, the latter proposition appears to have been considered to be established by the authorities. I do not feel satisfied that the authorities do establish that proposition. It is true that, in Ex parte Knee (4), where application was made for a writ of habeas corpus with a view to delivering to its mother the custody of an illegitimate child who had been placed with a third person by the putative father, MANSFIELD, C.J., said that the mother was entitled to the child if she insisted on it, unless some ground was shown by the affidavits to prevent her having the custody; but, in R. v. Moseley (5), which came before the court about the same time, LORD KENYON, C.J., said (5 East, at p. 224, n.):

"Where the father [he was speaking of the putative father of an illegitimate child] has the custody of a child fairly, I do not think that this court will take it away from him; but where he has got possession of the child by force or fraud, as is here suggested, we will interfere to put matters in the same position as before."

The same learned judge had, in a previous case of R. v. Soper (6), restored a child to the custody of a mother at her instance, where the putative father had obtained possession of it by fraud.

I do not gather that in either of these cases LORD KENYON acted on the view that the mother of an illegitimate child has an absolute legal right to its custody, but only that the court would intervene where she had been deprived of that custody by force or fraud; and, in R. v. Hopkins (7), two years after the decision of SIR JAMES MANSFIELD in Ex parte Knee (4), where a writ of habeas corpus was moved for by the mother of an illegitimate child which had been taken from her custody by force, LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., expressed some doubt, on the opening of the case, "whether the court could interfere on behalf of the mother of an illegitimate child, who had no legal right to the person of the child," and said that "the question of guardianship belonged to another forum, with which this court would not interfere." On the following day, in granting the writ, LORD ELLENBOROUGH said (7 East, at p. 580):

"We think that this is a proper occasion for the court by means of a remedial writ to restore the child to the same quiet custody in which it was before the transactions happened which are the subject of complaint, leaving to the proper forum the decision of any question touching the right of custody and guardianship of this child, with which we do not meddle."

In R. v. Nash, Re Carey (1), to which I shall have occasion to refer hereafter, it was not necessary, as was there pointed out, to determine whether the mother of an illegitimate child had, according to the common law, a right to its custody, the court exercising an equitable as well as legal jurisdiction, and being governed by the rules of equity.

It seems to me that there was in former times a disposition to carry out rigorously to its logical conclusion the doctrine that an illegitimate child was filius nullius, and to hold that no one possessed in relation to it the full parental rights which the law recognises in the case of legitimate offspring. When MAULE, J., in Re Lloyd (8) asked, "How does the mother of an illegitimate child differ from a stranger?" it does not appear to me that he was speaking ironically, but rather stating bluntly this legal doctrine. But, whatever may have been the view in former times, I cannot but think that the legislation embodied in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, s. 71, renders it impossible in the present day to regard the mother of an illegitimate child as destitute of any rights in relation to its custody. The obligation cast on the mother of an illegitimate child to maintain it till it attains the age of sixteen appears to me to involve a right to its custody.

It is, however, no longer important to inquire what are the rights of the mother in relation to an illegitimate child at common law. All the courts are now

A governed by equitable rules, and empowered to exercise equitable jurisdiction. As was said by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in R. v. Nash, Re Carey (1) (10 Q.B.D. at p. 456): "in equity regard was always had to the mother, putative father, and relations on the mother's side." In that case, the mother of an illegitimate child sought to have it delivered to her in order that it might be placed under the care of her sister. The child was in the custody of the wife of a labouring man, with whom it had been placed by the mother, who was living with another man as his mistress. The court, notwithstanding the opposition of the person in whose custody it was, ordered that the child should be delivered into the custody desired by the mother. I think that this case determines (and I concur in the decision) that the desire of the mother of an illegitimate child as to its custody is primarily to be considered. Of course, if it can be shown that it would be detrimental to the interest of the child that it should be delivered to the custody of the mother or of any person in whose custody she desires it to be, the court, exercising its jurisdiction, as it always does in such a case, with a view to the benefit of the child, would not feel bound to accede to the wishes of the mother.

D The principles on which the court ought to act on the application for the custody of an illegitimate child being thus, to my mind, free from doubt, I proceed to inquire how they ought to be applied to the present case. On a review of all the circumstances of this case, I feel it impossible to hold that to comply with the wishes of the mother would be so injurious to the child as to justify our disregarding them. For these reasons I think that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

LORD FIELD and LORD HANNEN concurred.

Special Case stated by justices for the county of Southampton.

On June 30, 1891, the respondent, Abraham Bartholomew, preferred an information against the appellant, Charles James Radclyffe, under s. 2 of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849, charging that, on May 30, 1891, he ill-treated a certain sheep by neglecting to supply sufficient food. By s. 14 of the Act of 1849, every complaint under the provisions of that Act "shall be made within one calendar month after the cause of complaint shall arise."

At the hearing, the appellant raised the preliminary objection that, as the offence was alleged to have been committed on May 30, 1891, and the complaint was not made until June 30, 1891, it had not been made within one calendar month after the cause of complaint had arisen, and that, therefore, the justices had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case. The justices were of opinion that, in computing the time, "one calendar month," within which the information had to be laid, the day on which the cause of complaint arose should be excluded, and that the information was, therefore, laid in sufficient time under the Act. Before proceedings with the hearing of the case, the justices stated this Case for the opinion of the court, the question for the opinion of the court being whether their construction of s. 14 of the Act of 1849 was correct.

Colam for the respondent.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the justices in this case was right, and that this appeal must, therefore, be dismissed. The law on this point has been quite clear since Hardy v. Ryle (1) and Williams v. Burgess (2). In the former case, the facts were very similar to those in this case, except that there the proceedings were civil, and here they are criminal. The plaintiff in that case was discharged from prison on Dec. 14, and commenced an action for false imprisonment on June 14 following. The court there held that the action was commenced within six months after the act was committed, as required by the Constables Protection Act, 1750, s. 8. It is true that, in Young v. Higgon (3), PARKE, B., criticised the reasoning by which Hardy v. Ryle (1) is supported, but he does not suggest any doubt as to the correctness of the conclusions arrived at, and his final observation is cogent authority in support of them.

It has, however, been argued that the law draws a distinction between statutes dealing with criminal and civil proceedings, and that, in the former case, whenever a period is fixed by statute within which proceedings must be taken, the day on which the offence was committed ought to be included in calculating that period. No authority has been given in support of this argument, and I do not think that there is any. I think that great mischief would result if the same words were to

Appeal by the respondent from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (LAW-RANCE and WRIGHT, JJ.), on a Special Case stated under s. 93 (7) of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. C

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the respondent, who in 1893 was a bankrupt under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, was thereby disqualified from being elected a member of a school board under s. 32 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The facts are set out in the judgment of LOPES, L.J.

Dickens, Q.C., and Day for the bankrupt. D

Channell, Q.C., and G. J. Talbot for the petitioners.

Mar. 8, 1894. LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case, the respondent was elected as a member of the Pulborough School Board, and the petitioners have presented a petition asking the court to say that he was disqualified from being elected. The Divisional Court held that he was disqualified. E

The circumstances are few and simple. The respondent was adjudged a bankrupt before the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; under what circumstances we do not know, but he is still an undischarged bankrupt. It is urged on his behalf that, under these circumstances, s. 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, does not apply to him. It is argued that there is nothing in the Act to show unmistakably that it is retrospective; that the disqualification imposed by s. 32 is penal, and that, therefore, according to the ordinary rules of construction, the section ought not to be construed to have a retrospective effect if such a construction can be avoided. In my opinion, s. 32 is not penal within the meaning of the proposition that penal enactments ought not, if possible, to be construed as retrospective. I also think that the section is not retrospective, and, in my opinion, the judgment of the Divisional Court was right. Section 32 (1) provides : F G

"Where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt, he shall be disqualified for . . . (e) being elected to or holding or exercising the office of member of a school board."

Whether or not that enactment is retrospective depends on the words at the beginning of the section. The section does not say where a debtor "has been" or "shall be" adjudged bankrupt, either of which forms would be clear; but it uses an expression between the two, i.e., where a debtor "is" adjudged bankrupt. What is the canon of construction to be applied to those words? H

In the first place, I think that the section is not "penal" within the meaning of that word as used in the rule against the construction of enactments as retrospective. I cannot think that the legislature intended these disqualifications to be punishments on a man for becoming bankrupt, because, by s. 32 (2), there are provisions for the removal of the disqualification if the bankrupt obtains from the court his discharge "with a certificate to the effect that his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune without any misconduct on his part." To say that the legislature intended by this section to punish a man of whom that could be proved would be to attribute to it gross injustice. It seems impossible to say that these disqualifications are imposed by way of punishment, and, therefore, in my opinion, they are intended to be solely for the protection of the public. In R. v. Vine (1), we I

A have a strong authority that a disqualification created under these circumstances cannot be penal within the meaning of the rule to which I have referred. I think that that is the effect of the judgment of COCKBURN, C.J.; but it was more clearly put by MELLOR, J., who says (L.R. 10 Q.B. at p. 200):

B "It appears to me to be the general object of this statute that there should be restraints as to the persons who should be qualified to hold licences, not as a punishment, but for the public good, upon the ground of character."

The question in that case was whether a person convicted of felony was disqualified from being licensed to keep a public-house. The case was a stronger one than the present, but it lays down a canon of construction that, if an enactment creates disqualifications, not by way of punishment, but only for the public good, it is not to be considered penal within the rule against construing an Act to be retrospective.

C A rule was also strongly and clearly laid down in Re Pratt, Ex parte Pratt (2), which is a decision on the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, though not on s. 32. The question turned on the meaning of s. 4 and s. 5. Section 4 provides that "a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy" in certain cases; and s. 5 provides, "if a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy." Both these sections of the statute are in the present tense, not the past or future, and the court held that s. 4 was not retrospective with regard to an act of bankruptcy committed before the passing of the statute, but that it applied to the state of things existing at the date of the passing of the statute, and therefore, that a petition could be presented after the passing of the Act, provided that, at some previous time, an act of bankruptcy had been committed, whether under the Act of 1883 or any previous Act. The present tense used in s. 4 and s. 5 referred to the date of the petition, not to the dates of things happening before the passing of the Act. BOWEN, L.J., says of the Act (12 Q.B.D. at p. 340):

E "I think it is framed on the idea that a bankruptcy code is being constructed, and when the present tense is used, it is used, not in relation to time, but as the present tense of logic."

F And FRY, L.J., says (ibid. at p. 341):

G "I entirely agree with BOWEN, L.J., as to the meaning of the present tense in this section; it is used, I think, to express a hypothesis, without regard to time, just as in stating the proposition 'if A. is B., then B. is C.' It is equivalent to saying, 'if at the time when the petition is presented the debtor shall have committed an act of bankruptcy.'"

The court there said that the present tense used in s. 4 and s. 5 refers to the time when the court has to act, and does not refer to the time when that on which the court acts came into existence.

H Applying those words to the present case, it seems to me that the words of s. 32, "Where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt," are to be construed as applying to the time when he is elected to, or is acting in any of, the positions mentioned in the section; that is to say, at the time when it is sought to show that he is disqualified. If he were elected before 1883, but acted after that year, the petition against him would be against his acting in his office, and the time when he was elected would be immaterial. If that is the true construction of the section, it is not retrospective. It is prospective, because it refers to a time after the passing of the Act. As I have already said, it seems to me impossible to say, after looking at the provision at the end of the section, that the legislature intended to impose disqualification as a punishment on a bankrupt; and, if that is so, the rule of construction against construing penal statutes as retrospective would not be applicable here. Therefore, both on the authority of this court and on the ordinary rules of construction, I am of opinion that this section is not retrospective.

To hold otherwise would, as it seems to me, cause a manifest injustice. There might be a case when a man, adjudicated bankrupt before 1883, under such circumstances that his discharge has been indefinitely postponed on the ground of misconduct, might, under the construction which has been put (though I myself am very doubtful about it) on the Elementary Education Act, 1870, be re-elected and then be no longer disqualified. It seems to me extraordinary, but at present we are not asked to overrule that so decided. Then there might be another man, an undischarged bankrupt under the Act of 1883, in this position that, when his bankruptcy is inquired into, he will be entitled to a certificate on the ground that it was caused by misfortune without any misconduct on his part. This man must retire from being a member of the school board, though the other man may remain. And further, the fraudulent undischarged bankrupt may be the petitioner to oust the innocent undischarged bankrupt. I cannot believe that we ought to construe the statute, if there is any doubt in the matter, in such a way as to cause such a result. Therefore, I agree with the judgment of the Divisional Court, and, in my opinion, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment.—The facts, so far as material, are as follows: On Mar. 19, 1893, the respondent had been adjudged a bankrupt under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. At a school board election, which took place on April 19, 1893, the respondent was a candidate for election, and was declared to be duly elected. At the time of his election, he had not obtained his discharge, nor had his bankruptcy been annulled. He was an undischarged bankrupt. On May 9, 1893, a petition was presented to the High Court alleging that the respondent at the time of his election was disqualified on the ground that he was an undischarged bankrupt. The question is whether, in the circumstances, the respondent, under s. 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is disqualified for being elected a member of the school board.

The answer to this question depends on whether s. 32 is retrospective in its operation, or prospective only, and s. 32 says that, where "a debtor is adjudged bankrupt," he shall, subject to the provisions of the Act, be disqualified for almost every kind of office and appointment, these being specified, and amongst them for "being elected a member of a school board." It has been contended that the words "is adjudged bankrupt" are to be read "has been adjudged bankrupt either before or after the passing of this Act." I cannot so read those words. Independently of other considerations, with which I will presently deal, and regarding them only from a grammatical standpoint, I should read them, "is adjudged bankrupt under this Act." The sentence would then be, where a debtor "is adjudged bankrupt under this Act he shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be disqualified." This reading seems more consonant with sense than "Where a debtor has been adjudged bankrupt under this Act, or any previous Act, he shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be disqualified." The former reading gives to "is" its ordinary and natural meaning; the latter distorts it. The Bankruptcy Court, 1883, was an Act to amend and consolidate the law of bankruptcy, and created disqualifications and disabilities which had not before attached to bankruptcy.

It is a well-recognised principle in the construction of statutes that they operate only on cases and facts which come into existence after the statutes were passed, unless a retrospective effect is clearly intended. This principle of construction is especially applicable when the enactment to which a retrospective effect is sought to be given would prejudicially affect vested rights or the legal character of past transactions. It need not be penal in the sense of punishment. Every statute, it has been said, which takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, or imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect of transactions already past, must be presumed to be intended not to have a retrospective effect. In Midland Rail. Co. v. Pye (3), ERLE, C.J.,

A says (10 C.B.N.S. at p. 191):

B “Those whose duty it is to administer the law very properly guard against giving to an Act of Parliament a retrospective operation, unless the intention of the legislature that it should be so construed is expressed in clear, plain and unambiguous language; because it manifestly shocks one’s sense of justice that an act, legal at the time of doing it, should be made unlawful by some new enactment. Modern legislation has almost entirely removed that blemish from the law; and wherever it is possible to put upon an Act of Parliament a construction not retrospective, the courts will always adopt that construction.”

C The position of the respondent previously to the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, under the School Board Act (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), was that, on his being adjudged a bankrupt under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, his seat on the board would be vacated, but he would be re-eligible for election at any succeeding triennial election of members of the board: R. v. Turmine (4). This case was not sought to be impugned at the Bar. Under s. 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the respondent on being adjudged a bankrupt is disqualified from being elected a member of the school board until the adjudication of bankruptcy against him is annulled or he obtains from the court his discharge, with a certificate to the effect that his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune, without any misconduct on his part. A new disability, therefore, is imposed on him, and disabilities are imposed on other persons which had no existence before the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Having regard to the scope of the Act, and the rule of construction applicable to statutes, I am confirmed in my view D as to the true reading of the words in s. 32 “is adjudged bankrupt.”

E It was urged that the words “Where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt” are equivalent to the words “Where a debtor is an adjudged bankrupt”; but, if the legislature so meant, why did they not use that form? And this observation is the more cogent, because, in the preceding section—viz., s. 31—the expression “undischarged bankrupt” is used. Again, s. 169 is most material, and points in the same direction. It provides that any proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act, F 1869, are to continue, and all its provisions are to apply thereto as if the Act of 1883 had not passed. The respondent’s bankruptcy is a pending proceeding, for he has not obtained his discharge, and he would have to apply for his discharge under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The legislature, in my opinion, intended that bankruptcies under the Act of 1869 were to be subject to the incident of a bankruptcy under that Act, and were not to be affected by the Act of 1883. The repeal G of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, is not to affect “anything done or suffered before the commencement of this Act under any enactment repealed by this Act” (Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 169 (2) (a)). This would appear to retain the old disqualification, which, as I have observed, was different and less severe than that imposed by s. 32. In s. 33 and s. 34, the same words “is adjudged bankrupt” are used, H and it cannot be contended that to those words, as used in those sections, a retrospective operation can be attached. It seems to me highly improbable that the legislature, when passing a new Bankruptcy Act creating great changes in the law and attaching wider and graver disabilities to bankruptcy, would impose new and penal consequences on bankruptcies already existing.

I WRIGHT, J., in his judgment, seems to have relied on the language of the Bankruptcy Disqualification Act, 1871, which is repealed by the Act of 1883, but re-enacted in this s. 32. The words are, “Every peer who becomes a bankrupt shall be disqualified”; and s. 9 says, that the Act shall apply to “Any person who before or after the passing of this Act becomes bankrupt, and subsequently succeeds to a peerage, whose bankruptcy has not determined at the time of his so succeeding... or any person who has become bankrupt before the time of the passing of this Act, and whose bankruptcy has not determined.”

The learned judge thinks it inconceivable that the legislature could have intended A a different construction to be placed on s. 32 without expressly saying so. In my opinion, the omission in the Act of 1883 of any interpretation clause, or any words giving a retrospective effect to the disability, is most significant, and is strong evidence to prove that no retrospective effect was intended. The court below were also much influenced, in my judgment, by R. v. Vine (1). It is always B dangerous to interpret one Act of Parliament by another, and the more especially is this the case where the words used and the subject-matter dealt with are different. The words under consideration in that case were, "Every person convicted of felony." It is difficult to distinguish those words from the words in question; but there was nothing in the Act of Parliament which had then to be construed to qualify or interpret their effect as there is in this case. Nothing, I mean, like s. 169, indicating that the incidents of an old bankruptcy under the C Act of 1869 were to continue, or like s. 33 and s. 34, where similar words are used in circumstances where a retrospective effect cannot be attributed to them.
Apart, however, from these points of difference, I do not hesitate to say I prefer the reasoning of LUSH, J., who differed from the other members of the court.

I cannot accept that case as governing the case now before us. Re Pratt, ex parte Pratt (2), which was cited, is also distinguishable. The construction adopted D did not impose any new liability or disability; it only gave effect to that which would have happened if the Act of 1883 had not been passed, viz., cases in which an act of bankruptcy had been committed under the Act of 1869, but no proceedings had been taken under that Act. It was a convenient construction to adopt, and does not militate with the view I take of s. 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, or the principles I apply to its construction. I think, therefore, that the E decision of the court below should be reversed.

DAYEY, L.J., read the following judgment.—I am of opinion that the appeal in this case ought to succeed. It was not contended on the part of the petitioners that any disability or disqualification was imposed on the respondent by the Elementary Education Act, 1870, or that R. v. Turmine (4) was wrongly decided. F
The question, therefore, seems to me to turn on the proper construction to be put on the words "Where a man is adjudged bankrupt" at the commencement of
s. 32 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Reading those words alone, and apart from considerations arising out of the subject-matter of the section in which they occur, I should certainly understand them (according to the ordinary use of the English language) to mean, if any man shall or may hereafter be adjudged bank- G rupt; and, unless there be some controlling context in the Act or in the section, I hold that to be the meaning of the words. It has been suggested that the words may be read as meaning "Where a man is an adjudged bankrupt." The answer seems to me to be that those are not the words before us, and that the words we have to construe are grammatically different. I think that the words "is adjudged" are the verb, whereas in the paraphrase suggested the word "adjudicated" would H be an adjective. The one form of sentence points to an event to happen, whereas the form suggested predicates a certain quality of the subject which may just as well attach to him by a previous adjudication as by a subsequent one.

Is there any context to be found in the Act itself which should control what I hold to be the prima facie meaning of the words? I think not. By s. 169, all existing disqualifications are preserved, and, although I do not think that the eligibility to a school board was a privilege or right preserved by that section, I think that the language of the section shows an intention to leave existing bank- I rupts as they were, and negatives any necessity for implying any new disqualification. If I turn to s. 33 and s. 34 in the same group of sections, where the same words are used, I find that they are necessarily prospective only, and they afford me no assistance in construing the words in s. 32 otherwise than in their ordinary grammatical sense. Does the subject-matter of the section supply any reason for so doing? In my opinion, the argument is the other way. This Act is not a School

- A Board Act, but a Bankruptcy Act for the primary purpose of defining the liabilities and consequences of bankruptcy, and although the section in question is, no doubt, dictated by regard to the public interest, it does impose disabilities and consequences of a serious character on persons adjudged bankrupt, and is in that sense and to that extent a penal enactment. It is a well-known principle in the construction of statutes that, where the words admit of two constructions, you are not
- B to construe them so as to produce a retrospective effect, or impose disabilities not existing at the passing of the Act. If I thought this language more ambiguous than I confess I do, I think that this principle should be applied, and the words, being at best ambiguous, ought not to be construed so as to impose on the existing bankrupts disabilities which they were not at that time under. If the legislature had meant such a result, it would have been exceedingly easy, instead of using
- C this ambiguous form of words, to say so—as was in fact done in the Bankruptcy Disqualification Act, 1871, referred to by WRIGHT, J.

With regard to the cases which have been referred to, in R. v. Vine (1), the words construed were grammatically and substantially different: "Every person convicted of felony." The observations I have made on the suggested paraphrase in the present case apply to the words in that case. In Re Pratt, Ex parte Pratt

D (2), the court had to construe other sections of the Bankruptcy Act expressed in different language and with a different context, and there were very strong reasons of policy and convenience for adopting the construction placed on the Act by the court. I do not think that it is any authority in the present case. For these reasons, I agree with the lord justice that the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

By s. 2 of the Chancery Amendment Act, 1858: "In all cases in which the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against a breach of any covenant, contract, or agreement, or against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act, or for the specific performance of any covenant, contract, or agreement, it shall be lawful for the same court, if it shall think fit, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to or in substitution for such injunction or specific performance, and such damages may be assessed in such manner as the court shall direct."

In the exercise of the jurisdiction given by the section attention ought to be paid to the well-settled principles on which injunctions were granted before the passing of the Act. Ever since the Act was passed the Court of Chancery has repudiated the notion that the legislature intended to turn the court into a tribunal for legalising illegal acts, and has protested against the notion that it ought to allow a wrong to continue simply because the wrongdoer is able and willing to pay for the injury he may inflict. Neither has the circumstance that the wrongdoer is in some sense a public benefactor (e.g., an electric, gas, or water company, or a sewer authority) ever been considered a sufficient reason for refusing to protect by injunction an individual whose rights are being persistently infringed. Where a plaintiff's legal right has been infringed and there is a threat of further infringement to a material extent prima facie he is entitled to an injunction. The jurisdiction to award damages instead of granting an injunction ought not to be exercised except in very exceptional circumstances, e.g., where the nuisance is trivial and occasional and the injury to the plaintiff's legal right is small, where the plaintiff has shown that he only wants money, where the plaintiff has so conducted himself as to render it unjust to give him more than pecuniary relief, where it would be otherwise oppressive to the defendant to grant an injunction, and where the injury to the plaintiff is capable of being assessed in money and an award of damages affords him an adequate remedy.

Injunction—Reversioner—Grant to—Injury to property continuing beyond the term.

An action by a reversioner for an injunction to restrain an injury to his reversion will lie if he can prove actual damage to the reversion, as where, by the acts of the defendant, the structure of a house of which the reversioner is the freeholder is damaged, and further acts of the defendant causing injury will continue beyond the term.

Notes. The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, s. 2, was repealed by the Statute Law Revision & Civil Procedure Act, 1883, but by s. 5 of the last-mentioned Act the repeal did not affect the jurisdiction established by the repealed enactment.

Appeals by the plaintiffs, Meux's Brewery Co., the freeholders, and Shelfer, the leaseholder, of the Waterman's Arms, a public-house, situate at Bankside, on the river Thames, against the decision of KEKEWICH, J., in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants, the City of London Electric Lighting Co., for an injunction to restrain them from the use of any dynamo or other engine or machinery so as by vibration or otherwise to injure the plaintiffs' premises, and as to the plaintiff Shelfer, the leaseholder, from causing a nuisance by vibration or noise, and for damages. G

In March, 1893, Shelfer took from Meux's Brewery Co. a lease of the Waterman's Arms for a term of twenty-one years, at the yearly rent of £70, and he also paid a premium. At the end of 1891 the defendants acquired land adjacent to the public-house, and erected thereon sheds, engine houses, a shaft, and all the buildings and machinery necessary for forming a large central station for the purpose of supplying electric light over a considerable area in the metropolis. Foundations for the works were sunk from 25 ft. to 30 ft. below the surface of the ground, and engines of 500 and 1,000 horsepower were fixed in position and commenced to work. At the trial it appeared from the evidence that until October, 1893, the noise and vibration arising from the working of the engines was not noticeable, but that in that month the working of the engines began to cause the rooms of the licensed premises and the furniture and bedsteads therein to vibrate, so as to interfere with the sleep, comfort, and health of the occupiers, two of the witnesses stating that the vibration caused actual sickness. A crack H

A also appeared in a wall, which, in March, 1894, extended through two storeys, and measured two inches wide in some places, while a hearthstone in one of the upper rooms became displaced. It was found, too, that the house, which before had a list to the east, now settled towards the west, the defendants' side of the premises. The defendants admitted that some noise arose from their exhausts, but undertook to abate it, but they denied that the crack was caused by their operations, and stated that the vibration was trivial. B KEKEWICH, J., held (70 L.T. 762) that, though the defendants were guilty of a nuisance, it was a case in which, in the exercise of his discretion under the Chancery Amendment Act, 1858 (Lord Cairns' Act), he ought not to grant an injunction, but only damages in both actions. From this decision the plaintiffs in both actions appealed.

Dec. 18, 1894. The following judgments were read.

D LORD HALSBURY.—The plaintiffs in these two actions complain of a nuisance created by the defendants by the vibration of their engines and the annoyance caused by the carrying on of their electric lighting works. Of the reality and gravity of the nuisance no serious denial has been made before us. The plaintiffs are respectively the lessee and reversioners of the house known as the Waterman's Arms. The considerations which arise are applicable to the plaintiffs in both E actions, except in so far as one is lessee and the others are reversioners. I will deal with that question separately. The nuisance being established, it is said, first, that the defendant company are authorised by law to carry on the business, and that they have done all that skill and care can effect to prevent any nuisance; that they are in the same position as a railway company, and they are entitled to do what they have done under the authority of the legislature. If the analogy were F a correct one, I should think the defendants had fallen very far short of proving that they had done all that was possible to prevent a nuisance. A railway company has a defined line of operation within which it may make its works, and, if it does all that can be done to prevent a nuisance, the undertaking having to be carried on in that place, and the traffic having to be carried on by means of locomotive engines over the line of railway, the legislature is taken to have sanctioned that proceeding with the necessary annoyance. No such considerations apply here. G It is not, however, necessary to deal with this part of the case, and I only mention it to disclaim the notion that I acquiesce in the allegation that it has been here proved that it is essential to the carrying on of the electric lighting business in the district in question that a nuisance should be created.

H The main question turns on the construction of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, and a Provisional Order which has become an Act of Parliament. It was boldly contended for the defendants that the Provisional Order protected the undertaking, and that, if a nuisance were necessarily created by the carrying on of the company's undertaking, such nuisance was authorised and even imposed as a duty on the undertakers. I think it is only necessary to read the provisional order in connection with s. 10 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, to dispose of that argument. I Section 10 [repealed by the Electricity Act, 1947] is in these words :

“The undertakers may, subject to and in accordance with the provisions and restrictions of this Act, and of any rules made by the Board of Trade in pursuance of this Act, and of any licence, order, or special Act authorising or affecting their undertaking, and for the purpose of supplying electricity, acquire such lands by agreement, construct such works, acquire such licences for the use of any patented or protected processes, inventions, machinery, apparatus, methods, materials, or other things, enter into such contracts, and generally do all such acts and things as may be necessary and incidental to such supply.”

The Provisional Order, which, as I said, has the same effect as an Act of Parliament, and which is relied on as an authority to create the nuisance, is in these words :

“Nothing in this Order shall exonerate the undertakers from any indictment, action, or other proceedings for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused by them.”

The general Act only gives them power subject to the restrictions of their particular Order, and the particular Order makes them expressly and in terms liable for creating a nuisance. I have also come to the conclusion that the powers given by s. 17 of that Act, read together with s. 10, are applicable to the execution of the authorised works as distinguished from the carrying on of the business; and when one considers how frequently the distinction between the execution of the works and the use of them when executed has been the subject of comment and decision, I think it must be taken that the language used has been deliberately chosen by the legislature as pointing to the distinction, now well recognised, between the construction of works and the user of them when constructed.

Assuming that there is a nuisance, and that there is no authority justifying it, the question still remains : What is the relief to which the plaintiffs are entitled? But for the provision of Lord Cairns' Act I suppose no one would have doubted that, in the state of facts I have now assumed to exist, the plaintiff Shelfer would have been entitled to an injunction to restrain the continuance of the nuisance. LORD KINGSDOWN, in the House of Lords (Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co. (Directors, etc.) v. Broadbent (1)), said (7 H.L.Cas. at p. 612) :

“The rule I take to be clearly this : if a plaintiff applies for an injunction to restrain a violation of a common law right, if either the existence of the right or the fact of its violation be disputed, he must establish that right at law; but when he has established his right at law, I apprehend that, unless there be something special in the case, he is entitled as of course to an injunction to prevent the recurrence of that violation.”

But it is said, and truly said, that the law has been altered by Lord Cairns' Act, and the question is : What construction is to be placed upon that enactment? Undoubtedly it conferred upon courts of equity the jurisdiction to award damages which did not exist before. But the question is not whether it has actually given an additional power, which is undoubted, but whether it was intended to interfere with the well-settled principles upon which courts of equity were in the habit of interfering in such cases as the present. It seems to me that the defects in the powers of the courts of equity which were sought to be supplied by that statute give ample grounds for the provisions of the statute without supposing that it was meant to revolutionise the principles upon which equitable jurisprudence had been administered up to that time. The language is general, and the discretion given is wide enough in terms to authorise a judge to award damages where formerly he would have granted an injunction. But there is nothing in this case which, to my mind, can justify the court in refusing to grant an injunction. The effect of such a refusal in a case like the present would operate to enable a company who could afford it to compel a neighbouring proprietor to sell, by continuing a nuisance, and simply paying damages for its continuance. I see no trace of any intention to alter the well-settled principles upon which injunctions were formerly granted. And further, I think the question is here covered by the authority of Martin v. Price (2) in this court. I think, therefore, the judgment of KEKEWICH, J., should be reversed as far as the refusal of an injunction is concerned, and that an injunction should be granted.

What I have said at present refers only to the case of Mr. Shelfer. It is said that the reversioners have no such right. It seems to me that that entirely ignores the state of the evidence in respect of the material and permanent injury to the structure itself. No doubt, where a nuisance will not necessarily continue

- A beyond the term, and the consequences of that nuisance will not fall on the reversioner's property, it may well be that the reversioner is not entitled to such a remedy. But where, as in this case according to the evidence, the walls of the house are so shaken that cracks are perceptible in them, and, if the present condition of things as regards the machinery were to continue without any alteration, there would be an increased injury to the actual subject of the reversion, it seems to me
- B absolutely impossible to contend that the reversioner is not equally entitled to the injunction asked for. There will, therefore, be damages in respect of the past injury, but inasmuch as the reversioners and the leaseholder between them represent the entirety of the interest, it will be desirable, and indeed necessary, for the purpose of justice that the defendants should not be called upon to pay twice over for the same damage because the plaintiffs are separate in point of interest.
- C The appeals will, therefore, be allowed with costs.

- LINDLEY, L.J.—The nuisance complained of in these actions is clearly proved as a fact. It is also proved that the nuisance is of a very serious character, and will continue, and will increase if the defendants are allowed to enlarge their machinery and to extend their operations as they propose to do. The persons who
- D complain of this nuisance are first, Shelfer, who is a lessee for twenty-one years, and the occupier of a public-house near the defendants' works; and, secondly, Meux's Brewery Co., who are his lessors. Both ask for an injunction, and for damages for the injury already done. They have not joined in one action as they might have done, but they have brought separate actions, which, however, came on for trial together. The learned judge has refused an injunction in both actions,
- E and has simply directed an inquiry as to damages. From this decision the plaintiffs, in both actions, have appealed, and they ask for an injunction. The defendants have not appealed; they do not, they say, object to pay damages or compensation, but they strongly object to an injunction, and, in opposing the granting of an injunction, their counsel have contended that the defendants have done no actionable wrong, and that the statute which applies to them authorises,
- F and indeed requires, them to supply electricity, and that the nuisance complained of is authorised by statute, and must, therefore, be submitted to by those who unfortunately suffer from it. It was contended by the plaintiffs that it was not open to the defendants to take this course without themselves appealing against the judgment for damages, but this contention cannot be supported. The defendants are entitled, if they choose, to waive their own right, if any, to appeal, and
- G yet to resist the further relief which the plaintiffs seeks to obtain against them.

- The defendants' contention that the nuisance is authorised by Act of Parliament cannot be supported. This question turns on the construction of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, ss. 10 and 17, and on the Provisional Orders of 1890 and 1891, made under its authority. These Orders prescribe the conditions on which the defendants are entitled to exercise their statutory powers, and they expressly say
- H that nothing in them shall justify a nuisance. The argument that the defendants can justify what they are doing under the Act of Parliament, although not under the Orders, is, in my opinion, displaced by the wording of the Act and Orders, which must be read together. When so read, they do not legalise any nuisance. Part of the price paid for the right to exercise the statutory powers is that those who exercise them do not create a nuisance. Another answer to the defendant's contention on this head is, that ss. 10 and 17 of the statute only relate to damage done on the execution of the company's works, and not to damage done afterwards by the use of engines, the erection of which is completely finished. I will add, further, that it is clearly for the defendants to prove, if they can, the truth of their assertion that it is impossible for them to carry on their business without creating a nuisance. The evidence as it stands does not satisfy me that this is really true. The defendants have not proved that they cannot supply electricity if they multiply their stations and diminish the power of their engines at each station. It is not shown that they cannot in this way avoid creating a nuisance at any of their stations. A

The nuisance not being legalised, the question arises whether the plaintiffs are not entitled to an injunction. I will first take the case of Shelfer, the tenant. Before Lord Cairns' Act, tenants certainly would have been entitled to an injunction to protect them during their tenancy. Nothing can be more explicit on the point than the decision of the House of Lords in Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co. (Directors, etc.) v. Broadbent (1), where a market gardener obtained an injunction against a gas company who injured his crops. LORD HALSBURY has read a passage from LORD KINGSDOWN's opinion; there is a similar passage in the opinion of LORD CAMPBELL, L.C. (7 H.L.Cas. at p. 610), and there is also the very valuable authority of LORD CRANWORTH's judgment in the same case in the Court of Appeal (7 De G.M. & G. at p. 462), which is exactly of the same nature. This case is an authority to show that an injunction would not be refused on the ground that the public would be inconvenienced if an injunction were granted. B C

But then it is urged that, although this was the law before Lord Cairns' Act, that Act had given the court a discretion to award damages even in the case of a clear continuing nuisance of a serious character. It is very true that Lord Cairns' Act conferred upon the Court of Chancery jurisdiction (which it had not before) to award damages in lieu of an injunction. Section 2 provides that, D

"in all cases in which the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against a breach of any covenant, contract, or agreement, or against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act, or for the specific performance of any covenant, contract, or agreement, it shall be lawful for the same court, if it shall think fit, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to or in substitution for such injunction or specific performance; and such damages may be assessed in such manner as the court shall direct." E

The jurisdiction to give damages instead of an injunction is in words given in all cases, but the use of the word "damages" has led to a doubt whether the Act applies to cases where no injury at all has yet been inflicted, but where injury is threatened only. Subject, however, to this doubt, there appears to be no limit to the jurisdiction. But, in exercise of the jurisdiction thus given, attention ought to be paid to well-settled principles, and ever since Lord Cairns' Act was passed, the Court of Chancery has repudiated the notion that the legislature intended to turn the court into a tribunal for legalising illegal acts; or, in other words, the court has always protested against the notion that it ought to allow a wrong to continue simply because the wrong-doer is able and willing to pay for the injury he may inflict. Neither has the circumstance that the wrong-doer is in some sense a public benefactor (e.g., a gas or water company, or a sewer authority) ever been considered a sufficient reason for refusing to protect by injunction an individual whose rights are being persistently infringed. Expropriation, even for a money consideration, is only justifiable where Parliament has sanctioned it. Courts of justice are not like Parliament, who consider whether proposed works will be so beneficial to the public as to justify exceptional legislation and the deprivation of people of their rights with or without compensation. F G H

Lord Cairns' Act was not passed in order to supersede special legislation for public purposes, but to enable the Court of Chancery to administer justice between litigants more effectually than it could before the Act. This is the view which has always been taken of the Act, as is plain from Goldsmid v. Tunbridge Wells Improvement Comrs. (3); Clowes v. Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Co. (4); Krehl v. Burrell (5); and Martin v. Price (2). In Martin v. Price (2) the principle on which the court ought to act was quite recently enunciated and enforced. The court there, in a carefully considered judgment, said [1894] 1 Ch. at p. 285): I

"The plaintiff's legal right and its infringement already, and threatened further infringement to a material extent, being thus established, the plaintiff is en-

A titled to an injunction according to the ordinary principles on which the court is in the habit of acting in these cases. There might of course be circumstances depriving the plaintiff of his prima facie right; but we can discover none in this case."

B In that case, accordingly, the Court of Appeal granted an injunction which had been refused by the court below, being of opinion that the discretion given to the court by Lord Cairns' Act had been wrongfully exercised. So here, guided by the same principle, I come to the same conclusion. Without denying the jurisdiction to award damages instead of an injunction even in cases of continuing actionable nuisances, such jurisdiction ought not to be exercised in such cases, except under very exceptional circumstances. I will not attempt to specify them, or to lay down rules for the exercise of judicial discretion. It is sufficient to refer, by way of example, to trivial and occasional nuisances—cases in which a plaintiff has shown that he only wants money; vexatious and oppressive cases; and cases where the plaintiff has so conducted himself as to render it unjust to give him more than pecuniary relief. In all such cases as these, and in all others where an action for damages is really an adequate remedy, as where the acts complained of are finished already, an injunction can be properly refused. There are no circumstances here which, according to recognised principles, justify the refusal of an injunction, and in my opinion, therefore, an injunction ought to have been granted in the action brought by the tenant.

E I pass now to the action brought by Meux's Brewery Co., the landlords. They sue in respect of actual and prospective injury to their reversion. Actual injury is proved, for their house is structurally injured by the defendant's operations, and further prospective injury from continued and increased vibration is also proved. This is not the case of a temporary nuisance, which is likely to cease before the existing tenancy expires, and which nuisance, therefore, although it may affect the present value of the reversion, will not affect the value when it falls into possession. The nuisance in this case is of a totally different character, and for such a permanent nuisance as this, and consequent permanent injury to the reversion, I have no doubt an action by the reversioner for damages would lie. The cases on this subject, from Baxter v. Taylor (6) downwards, will be found collected in the judgment of NORTH, J., in Mayfair Property Co. v. Johnston (7), and I do not, therefore, refer to them here. It is true that in Jones v. Chappell (8) an injunction sought by a reversioner to restrain noise and vibration was refused, but it was refused because they might cease before the reversioner came into possession. But in this case it is idle to suppose that the vibration, which is the real cause of continuing injury, will cease. It must be borne in mind that the defendants are a corporation, created for the express purpose of supplying electricity for a time to which no limit can be assigned; and they have gone to great expense in making foundations and erecting permanent works on a large scale.

H Jones v. Chappell (8) may be compared with Clowes v. Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Co. (4). There a reversioner applied for an injunction to restrain the defendants from fouling a stream. MALINS, V.-C., refused the injunction on the ground that the reversion was not materially or permanently injured, and that, if it was, the plaintiff's remedy was compensation under the defendants' special Acts. I But on appeal this decision was reversed, and an injunction was granted, JAMES, L.J., saying that the injunction was really a matter of course. This case arose after Lord Cairns' Act had come into operation. The common law decisions show that an action by a reversioner for an injury to his reversion will lie if he can prove actual damage to his reversion, or, as some express it, any injury of such permanent nature as to be necessarily injurious to his reversion. Where this is proved, as it is here, a reversioner is, in my opinion, entitled to an injunction upon the principles which I have already explained. In the Meux's Brewery Co.'s action, therefore, I also think an injunction ought to have been granted. There ought to be one order in both appeals, varying the judgments appealed from, by granting an injunction restraining the defendants from carrying on these works so as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiffs in either action. The form ought to be that adopted when landlord and tenant join in one action to have their respective interests protected. The defendants must pay the costs of the action brought by Meux's Brewery Co., and also the costs of these appeals. The damages in Meux's Brewery Co.'s action ought to be referred to the same referee to whom the damages in Shelfer's action have been referred. This will protect the defendants from the risk of having to pay more than they ought in the aggregate.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I will first give judgment in the case of Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. I cannot agree to the proposition put forward on behalf of the plaintiff that under Lord Cairns' Act which was passed in 1858, jurisdiction is only given to the Court of Chancery to award damages in lieu of an injunction in those cases in which application is made for a mandatory injunction, and that there is no jurisdiction to do so if the object of the injunction is to prevent a continuing nuisance. It may well be, as stated by him, that only fourteen cases are to be found in the books since the year 1858, in which damages in lieu of an injunction have been awarded by the Court of Chancery, and that all these are cases in which mandatory injunctions were sought; but this constitutes no canon of construction whereby to interpret s. 2 of Lord Cairns' Act. This section is in the widest possible terms, and I can find no limitation as to it applying only where the injunction sought is mandatory as distinguished from an injunction to prevent a continuing nuisance. As regards jurisdiction, construing the section according to its plain English, I cannot doubt that the Court of Chancery has the power in the one case as in the other to award damages in substitution for an injunction. The only binding authority which has placed a restricted construction upon the section is Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co. (9) in this court, in which it was held that for an injury not yet committed, but only threatened, the Court of Chancery has no power to award damages. The present case is not for threatened injury, but for a continuing nuisance existing at the date of the writ, whereby damage has been and still is being sustained. That jurisdiction to award damages exists in the present case I cannot doubt; but whether it should be exercised in such a case is quite another question.

It was argued on behalf of the defendants, that, even if they were committing a nuisance to the plaintiff and his family as found by KEKEWICH, J., no injunction would be granted against them, for the combined effect of ss. 10 and 17 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, was to authorise their doing what they were doing upon making full compensation to the plaintiff for all damage sustained by him thereby. In my judgment, this is not the true reading of these sections. Section 10, read in conjunction with the interpretation section (s. 32), is confined to construction of the works required to supply electricity and does not apply to their subsequent user, and s. 17 is confined to payment for damage caused by the execution of such works, and does not apply to damage caused by their user. Further, whatever be the true construction of these sections, the defendants were only authorised by the Act of 1882 to set up works and supply electricity subject to and in accordance with the provisions and restrictions of the Order or special Act authorising or affecting their undertaking; and by the Provisional Order, confirmed by Act of Parliament, under which the defendants were authorised to erect works and supply electricity, it is expressly provided that nothing therein contained should exonerate the defendants from any indictment, action, or other proceedings for nuisance, in the event of any nuisance being caused by them. This point of the defendants appears to me to be wholly untenable, and I agree in the conclusion KEKEWICH, J., arrived at therein. If authorities were wanted, though I think they are not, I refer to A.-G. v. Gas Light and Coke Co. (10) and A.-G. v. Leeds Corpn. (11).

I now come to the question whether, in a case like the present, to award damages

A in substitution for an injunction is or is not an altogether erroneous exercise of the jurisdiction given by the section. KEKEWICH, J., has found—and there is no appeal against these findings—that the defendants were, at the date this action was brought, creating a continuing nuisance by means of vibration, noise, and steam, which were produced by the working of their plant and machinery, whereby not only annoyance, inconvenience, and personal discomfort were occasioned to the plaintiff, his wife and daughter, in the occupancy of their house, but that the two latter had, by the nuisance, been made actually ill. There was also evidence that the defendants, by the erection of their works, had let down the building of the plaintiff, which consequently cracked, and that the continuous vibration which subsequently arose from the user of the defendants' plant and machines was increasing and aggravating these cracks. It was proved that the defendants were producing electricity by means of engines of from 4,000 to 5,000 horse-power, and that, unless stopped by injunction, they were about to increase their engine power to at least 20,000 horse power. It appears to me, to use the words in the judgment in Martin v. Price (2), to which I was a party, that

D “the plaintiff's legal right, and its infringement already, and threatened further infringement to a material extent, being thus established, the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction according to the ordinary principles upon which the court is in the habit of acting in these cases.”

E What is there in this case to take it out of the ordinary rule? There is no suggestion of any conduct on the plaintiff's part depriving him of his prima facie right to an injunction. Then, why is it that KEKEWICH, J., awarded damages in place of an injunction? The learned judge appears to have thought that, because the defendants at the trial had consented to abate the nuisance caused by steam, though not that caused by vibration and noise, damages were the proper remedy and adequate to compensate the plaintiff; but I would point out that the learned judge himself stated in his judgment that he was unable to allot to the different matters complained of the part each took in creating the undoubted nuisance

F proved to exist, and the reasons he gives for awarding damages are as follows :

G “Having regard to the occupation not having been as a matter of money interfered with; having regard also to this, that the inconvenience is felt very much more at one part of the house than the other, almost exclusively as regards a great part of the complaint in the upper floors; and having regard at any rate to the possibility of some inconvenience and probably some loss of accommodation, of making sleeping arrangements elsewhere; having regard also to the large inconvenience, to say no more, of stopping a business such as carried on by the defendants, I think this is a case in which damages are a very fair compensation.”

H I cannot agree with the learned judge that, because the plaintiff does not suffer a money loss, and is only driven out of this upper floor, and has only to make arrangements for sleeping elsewhere, he, according to the judgment, is not entitled to stop the continuance of the nuisance, but damages are a very fair compensation. Many judges have stated, and I emphatically agree with them, that a person committing a wrongful act (whether it be a public company for public purposes or a private individual) is not entitled to ask the court, by assessing damages in that behalf, to sanction his so doing by purchasing his neighbour's rights, leaving his neighbour with a nuisance or his light diminished, as the case may be. In such cases the well-known rule is not to accede to the application, but to grant the injunction sought, for the plaintiff's legal right has been invaded, and he is prima facie entitled to an injunction.

There are, however, cases in which this rule may be relaxed, and in which damages, as authorised by the section, may be awarded. In any case in which a case for an injunction has been made out, if the plaintiff by his acts or laches has disentitled himself to an injunction, the court may award damages in its place.

So again, whether the case be for a mandatory injunction or to restrain a continuing nuisance, the appropriate remedy may be damages in lieu of an injunction, assuming a case for an injunction to be made out. In my opinion, it may be stated as a good working rule that (i) if the injury to the plaintiff's legal right is small; (ii) and is one which is capable of being estimated in money; (iii) and is one which can be adequately compensated by a small money payment; (iv) and the case is one in which it would be oppressive to the defendant to grant an injunction, damages in lieu of an injunction may be awarded. If these four requirements are found in combination in a case, then damages in substitution for an injunction may be given. There may also be cases in which, though the four above-mentioned requirements exist, the defendant, by his conduct, as, for instance, hurrying up his buildings so as, if possible, to avoid an injunction, or otherwise acting with a reckless disregard to the plaintiff's rights, has disentitled himself from asking that damages may be assessed in substitution for an injunction. It is impossible to lay down any rule as to what, under the differing circumstances of each case, constitute either small injury, or what can be estimated in money, or what is a small money payment or an adequate compensation, or what would be oppressive to the defendant. This must be left to the good sense of the tribunal which deals with each case as it comes up for adjudication. For instance, in the case of an injury to the plaintiff's legal right to light a window in a cottage, a sum of £15 as compensation might well be held to be not small but considerable; whereas a sum ten times as large awarded as compensation for a similar injury to a warehouse or other large building, might be held to be inconsiderable. Each case must be decided upon its own facts, but to escape the rule it must be brought within the exception.

In the present case it appears to me that the injury to the plaintiff is certainly not small, nor is it, in my judgment, capable of being estimated in money and of being adequately compensated by a small money payment. For nineteen years the plaintiff is saddled with his lease, and for that period, upon the hypothesis of the nuisance continuing, he is to suffer whatever annoyance, inconvenience, and personal discomfort may be created by the user of the works of the defendants other than by steam; and cracks in the walls of the house already made by the defendant's works are to be increased; and it may be that his wife and daughter throughout that period are to continue to be made ill as heretofore. Can anyone truly say that this is a small injury to the plaintiff's legal rights? Moreover, how are these injuries to be put into money, and upon what principle are these damages to be assessed, so as to represent the continuing injury to the plaintiff? To guess at them is not assessing them at all. In order to constitute a real assessment, it appears to me that the principle of purchasing the plaintiff's interest in his lease for the unexpired term will have to be adopted as the basis upon which the assessment is to be made, and, as I have before stated, this is never sanctioned by the court at the instance of a tort-feasor. The assessment upon the facts found will manifestly not result in a small money payment. In my judgment, for the reasons above, this is clearly not a case in which damages should be granted to the plaintiff in substitution for the injunction which he asks for, which is an injunction to restrain the continuance of the existing nuisance. If the remedies the defendants are about to apply to the steam will abate the nuisance, well and good, and the injunction will not injure them; but if, on the other hand, a nuisance still continues, in my judgment, this case is by no means brought within the exception to the ordinary rule which I have endeavoured to express, and, therefore, the judgment of KEKEWICH, J., wherein he awarded damages in substitution for an injunction, must be reversed and an injunction as prayed for be granted.

As regards the case of the reversioners, Meux's Brewery Co., this appears to me to give rise to a discussion of a somewhat academic description so far as the defendants are concerned, when an injunction has been granted against them in the case of the tenant Shelfer. It may, however, be of moment to the plaintiffs,

A the reversioners, for the reasons pointed out by their counsel, and more especially as the works of the defendants as regards engine power are about to be enormously enlarged, which obviously will increase the present continual injury to the fabric of the house. There is evidence that the defendants are committing, and are proposing to continue to commit, acts which will cause injury to the fabric of the plaintiff's house of a permanent character, and for which a jury would be well warranted in finding an injury to the reversion. I agree with what LORD HALSBURY and LINDLEY, L.J., have said upon this matter, and that an injunction should be granted as in the case of the tenant. These appeals, for reasons above stated, must be allowed with costs.

F Conflict of Laws—Contract—Parties residing in different places where different systems of law prevail—Law governing rights under contract—Intention of parties—Matters to be taken into consideration.

Where a contract is entered into between parties residing in different places where different systems of law prevail, it is a question in each case with reference to what law the parties contracted and according to what law it was their intention that their rights either under the whole or any part of the contract should be determined. In considering what law is to govern, the lex loci solutionis is a matter of great importance. The lex loci contractus is also of importance. Both these matters must be taken into consideration, but neither of them is of itself conclusive, and still less conclusive as to the particular law which was intended to govern a particular part of the contract.

G The whole of the contract must be looked at, and the contract regulated by the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract or derivable by fair implication from its terms. In the absence of any clear expression of their intention it is necessary and legitimate to take into account the circumstances attendant on the making of the contract and the course of performing its stipulations contemplated by the parties.

I An agreement in writing, by which a seller resident in Scotland and a buyer resident in England agreed for the sale and purchase of goods to be delivered in Scotland, contained a clause that any dispute should be "settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way." The seller brought an action against the buyer in the Scottish courts for breach of the contract by failure to accept goods delivered under it, and the buyer pleaded the arbitration clause. It was agreed that that clause was void and of no effect under Scottish law, but was valid and binding under English law.

Held: the language of the arbitration clause indicated clearly that the parties intended that the rights under that clause should be determined according to the law of England, and the case would be remitted to the Court of Session with an order that the matters in dispute be settled by arbitration in terms of the contract.

Appeal from a decision of the First Division of the Court of Session (LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNEAR dissenting), reported in 21 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 204, affirming a decision of the Lord Ordinary (LORD KYLLACHY) in an action brought by the respondents against the appellants for non-acceptance of goods under an agreement.

The agreement, which was executed by both parties in England, was as follows:

"Memorandum of agreement between Messrs. Roderick Kemp & Co., of Talisker Distillery, Carbost, North Britain, distillers, of the one part, and Messrs. Hamlyn & Co., 153, Cheapside, in the city of London, merchants, of the other part.—Whereas the said R. Kemp & Co. agree to sell, and the said Hamlyn & Co. agree to purchase, all grains made by the said Roderick Kemp & Co., or their nominees or assigns, averaging about 800 to 1,000 bushels per week (with the exception of about two quarters required for the use of the said Kemp & Co.) at the price of 1s. 8d. per quarter (eight bushels), according to the number of quarters of corn or malt put into the mash tub. It is further agreed that the said Hamlyn & Co. supply and erect at the aforementioned distillery one of Messrs. Petry and Hecking's patent drying machines, such machines to remain the property of the said Hamlyn & Co., and that the said Roderick Kemp & Co. shall thereupon work and keep in proper repair the said drying machine, supplying all steam and labour, etc., necessary for properly drying the grains for the said Hamlyn & Co., and will bag up in the said Hamlyn & Co.'s sacks, and deliver the grains f.o.b., Carbost, to their order, or otherwise, as required. This contract be in force for 10 (ten) years from time of erection. At the expiration of the said ten years the said Hamlyn & Co. to be at liberty to take away the said drying machine without let or hindrance. Should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way. As witness the hands of the said parties this 27th day of January, 1892.—Hamlyn & Co.; Roderick Kemp & Co.—Witnessed the above signatures: David Lyall, clerk, 80, Ockenden Road, Islington."

A The defender pleaded that the action was excluded by the clause of reference in the memorandum of agreement. The plaintiffs replied that the clause was a submission to unnamed arbitrators, and was, therefore, invalid by the law of Scotland, by which the case was to be governed, though admitted to be good by the law of England. The Lord Ordinary and the majority of the judges of the First Division upheld this contention.

C May 10, 1894. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL. L.C.—On Jan. 27, 1892, an agreement was entered into between Roderick Kemp & Co., of the Talisker Distillery, Carbost, Isle of Skye [predecessors of the respondents], and Hamlyn & Co., of London [the appellants], under which Hamlyn & Co. were to supply to the distillery a patent drying machine, which was to be worked by the distillery company, who were to bag up and deliver to Hamlyn & Co. dried grain free on board at Carbost to their order, or otherwise as required. The agreement concluded with a clause in the following terms:

“Should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way.”

E This agreement was made between the parties in England. Shortly after the contract was entered into, Alexander Grigor Allan became the sole partner in the firm of Roderick Kemp & Co., and the present action was instituted by him in Scotland in respect of an alleged breach of the contract. The defenders pleaded that the Court of Session had “no jurisdiction,” and that “the action is excluded by the clause of reference in the memorandum of agreement.” These pleas were repelled by the Lord Ordinary, and his judgment was affirmed by LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN in the Inner House, LORD KINNEAR dissenting. During the course of the litigation the pursuer died, and is now represented by the respondents.

F It is not in controversy that the arbitration clause is, according to the law of England, a valid and binding contract between the parties, nor that, according to the law of Scotland, it is wholly invalid inasmuch as the arbiters are not named.

G The view taken by the majority of the court below is thus expressed by LORD ADAM:

H “So far as I see, nothing is required to be done in England in implement of the contract. That being so, I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the construction and effect of the agreement, and of all and each of its stipulations, is to be determined by the lex loci solutionis—that is, by the law of Scotland.”

I It is not denied that the conclusion thus arrived at renders the arbitration clause wholly inoperative, and thus defeats the expressed intention of the parties, but this is treated as inevitably following from the rule of law that the rights of the parties must be wholly determined by the lex loci solutionis. I am not able altogether to agree with the view taken by the learned Lord that everything required to be done in implement of the contract was to be done in Scotland, inasmuch as it appears to me that the arbitration clause which I have read to your Lordships does not indicate that that part of the contract between the parties was to be implemented by performance in Scotland. That clause is as much a part of the contract as any other clause of the contract, and certainly there is nothing on the face of it to indicate, but quite the contrary, that it was in the contemplation of the parties that it should be implemented in Scotland.

The learned judges in the court below treat the lex loci solutionis of the main portion of the contract as conclusively determining that all the rights of the parties under the contract must be governed by the law of that place. I am unable to agree with them in this conclusion. Where a contract is entered into between parties residing in different places where different systems of law prevail, it is a question, as it appears to me, in each case with reference to what law the parties contracted, and according to what law it was their intention that their rights either under the whole or any part of the contract should be determined. In considering what law is to govern, the lex loci solutionis is a matter of great importance. The lex loci contractus is also of importance. In the present case the place of the contract was different from the place of its performance. It is not necessary to enter upon the inquiry, which was a good deal discussed at the Bar, to which of these considerations the greatest weight is to be attributed, namely, the place where the contract was made or the place where it is to be performed. In my view, they are both matters which must be taken into consideration, but neither of them is of itself conclusive, and still less is it conclusive, as it appears to me, as to the particular law which was intended to govern particular parts of the contract between the parties. In this case, as in all such cases, the whole of the contract must be looked at, and the contract must be regulated by the intention of the parties as appearing from the contract. It is perfectly competent to those who, under such circumstances as I have indicated, are entering into a contract, to indicate by the terms which they employ which system of law they intend to be applied to the construction of the contract, and to the determination of the rights arising out of the contract.

In the present case it appears to me that the language of the arbitration clause indicates very clearly that the parties intended that the rights under that clause should be determined according to the law of England. As I have said, the contract was made there; one of the parties was residing there. Where under such circumstances the parties agree that any dispute arising out of their contract shall be "settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way," it seems to me that they have indicated as clearly as it is possible their intention that that particular stipulation, which is a part of contract between them, shall be interpreted according to and governed by the law, not of Scotland, but of England, and I am aware of nothing which stands in the way of the intention of the parties thus indicated by the contract they entered into, being carried into effect. As I have already pointed out, the contract with reference to the arbitration would have been absolutely null and void if it were to be governed by the law of Scotland. That cannot have been the intention of the parties; it is not reasonable to attribute that intention to them if the contract may be otherwise construed; and for the reasons which I have given, I see no difficulty whatever in construing the contract between the parties as an indication that the contract, or that term of it, was to be governed and regulated by the law of England.

But then it is said that the Scottish court is asked to enforce a law which is against the public policy of the law of Scotland, and that, although the parties may have so contracted, the courts in Scotland cannot be bound to enforce the contract which is against the policy of their law. I should be prepared to admit that an agreement which was against a fundamental principle of the law of Scotland, founded on consideration of public policy, could not be relied upon and insisted upon in the courts of Scotland; and if according to the law of Scotland the courts never allowed their jurisdiction to try the merits of a case to be interfered with by an arbitration clause, there would be considerable force in the contention which is insisted upon by the respondents. But that is not the case. The courts in Scotland recognise the rights of the parties to a contract to determine that any disputes under it shall be settled, not in the ordinary course of litigation, but by an arbitration tribunal selected by the parties. If in the present case the arbitrators have been named, the courts in Scotland would have recognised, and

A given effect to, and enforced the arbitration clause, and would by reason of it have declined to enter upon a trial of the merits of the case. That being so, I have been unable to understand upon what fundamental principle of public policy it can be said to rest as a foundation that where an arbitrator is not named, an agreement between the parties to refer a matter to arbitration ought not to be enforced. It is not necessary to inquire into the history of the distinction which has arisen in the courts of Scotland between arbitration clauses where arbiters are named and clauses with an unnamed arbiter. It is sufficient to say that when once it is admitted, as it must be, that the courts of Scotland do enforce and give effect to an arbitration clause and hold their hands from the determination of the merits by reason of the parties having agreed upon it, it seems to me to follow that, if this arbitration clause is to be interpreted according to the law of England, and is, therefore, a valid arbitration clause, there is no reason why the courts of Scotland should not give effect to it just as much as if it were a valid arbitration clause according to the law of Scotland.

But then it is argued that an agreement to refer disputes to arbitration, deals with the remedy, and not with the rights of the parties, and that consequently the forum being Scottish, the parties cannot by reason of the agreement into which they have entered, interfere with the ordinary course of proceedings in the courts of Scotland. Stated generally, I should not dispute that proposition so far as it lays down that the parties cannot, in a case where merits fall to be determined in the Scottish courts, insist by virtue of an agreement that those courts shall depart from their ordinary course of procedure. But that is not really the question which has to be determined in the present case. The question which has to be determined is whether it is a case in which the courts of Scotland ought to entertain the merits and adjudicate upon them. If it were such a case, then no doubt the ordinary course of procedure in the Scottish courts would have to be followed; but the preliminary question has to be determined whether by virtue of a valid clause of arbitration the proper course is for the courts in Scotland not to adjudicate upon the merits of the case but to leave the matter to be determined by the tribunal to which the parties have agreed to refer it. Viewed in that light, I can see no difficulty, but the argument that to give effect to this arbitration clause would interfere with the course of procedure in the forum in which the action is pending seems to me entirely to fail. For these reasons I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed.

The question then arises, what course should be taken in the present case—whether the action should be stayed until the arbitration is completed, or whether the House should make an order remitting the cause to be determined pursuant to the arbitration clause. I am quite satisfied, upon that part of the case, with the suggestion which will be made by LORD WATSON, and I think that there is really no difficulty in the manner in which he proposes to give effect to the contract between the parties.

LORD WATSON.—This action was brought in the Court of Session by a Scottish distiller, who died during its dependence, and is now represented by the respondents, against the appellant firm, who are merchants in London, concluding for damages in respect of their breach of a mercantile contract. For the purposes of this appeal it is sufficient to say that the contract, which was made in England, but fell to be mutually performed in Scotland, contains this provision :

“Should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way.”

In defence the appellants pleaded (i) no jurisdiction; (ii) the action is excluded by the clause of reference. Both pleas were exclusively founded upon the agreement to refer. They were repelled by the Lord Ordinary (KYLACHY), and, in the First Division, by LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNEAR dissenting. The learned judges of the majority were of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that, inasmuch as Scotland was admittedly the locus solutionis, the whole stipulations of the contract, including the clause of reference, must be governed by Scottish law. In that view the agreement to refer, being to arbiters unnamed, was plainly invalid, and their Lordships accordingly sent the case to proof before the Lord Ordinary.

With reference to the two pleas which have been repelled, I wish to observe that, although they seem to have become stereotyped in cases like the present, they do not correctly represent the rights of a defender, who relies upon a valid contract to submit the matter in dispute to arbitration. The jurisdiction of the court is not wholly ousted by such a contract. It deprives the court of jurisdiction to inquire into and decide the merits of the case, while it leaves the court free to entertain the suit, and to pronounce a decree in conformity with the award of the arbiter. Should the arbitration, from any cause, prove abortive, the full jurisdiction of the court will revive, to the effect of enabling it to hear and determine the action upon its merits. When a binding reference is pleaded in limine the proper course to take is either to refer the question in dispute to the arbiter named or to stay procedure until it has been settled by arbitration. The latter course was adopted in Caledonian Rail. Co. v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Rail. Co. (1), where the reference was to arbiters unnamed, but had been confirmed by statute. I cite that case, not as establishing, but as illustrating, the rule of procedure, which was in force long before its date.

The first question in this appeal is whether the law of England or the law of Scotland applies to the interpretation of the clause of reference. If the law of Scotland must prevail, the judgments appealed from are unimpeachable. If, on the other hand, the contract must be governed by English law, the clause of reference is obligatory according to that law; and in that event the further question arises whether the courts of Scotland ought to give the same effect to it as if it had been a binding Scottish covenant. Upon the first of these questions I have been unable to arrive at the same conclusion as the courts below. When two parties living under different systems of law enter into a personal contract, which of these systems must be applied to its construction depends upon their mutual intention, either as expressed in their contract or as derivable by fair implication from its terms. In the absence of any clear expression of their intention it is necessary and legitimate to take into account the circumstances attendant upon the making of the contract and the course of performing its stipulations contemplated by the parties, and among these considerations the locus contractus and the locus solutionis have always been regarded as of importance, although English and Scottish decisions differ in regard to the relative weight which ought to be attributed to them when the place of contracting is in one forum and the place of performance in another.

In the present case it does not appear to me to be necessary to discuss the relative value of these considerations, because, in my opinion, the clause of reference is expressed in terms which clearly indicate that the parties had in contemplation, and agreed that it should be interpreted according to the rules of English law. If they had stipulated that all disputes arising out of the contract were to be decided in the Court of Session, I should have been of opinion that they had in view the principles of Scottish law, and meant that their mutual stipulations should be construed according to these principles. And, to my mind, their selection from the membership of a commercial body in London of a conventional tribunal which is to act "in the usual way," or, in other words, in the manner which is customary in London, indicates, not less conclusively, that, in agreeing to such an arbitration, they were contracting with reference to the law of England. Upon the assumption that the contract must be read in the light of English law, the respondents maintained that, in so far as concerns the agreement to refer, that law is inadmissible. They argued that the agreement relates, not to the substance of the contract, but to the remedy which the parties were to pursue; and that, according to a well-known principle of general law, all questions touching

A the remedy must be decided according to the rules of the forum in which the remedy is sought. They also contended that the Lords of Sessions were not bound to recognise any reference to unnamed arbiters, whatever might be its validity elsewhere, to the effect of excluding their own jurisdiction, because its recognition would be contrary to the policy of Scottish law.

Neither of these contentions is, in my opinion, well founded. It has never, so far as I am aware, been seriously disputed that, whatever may be the domicile of a contract, any court which has jurisdiction to entertain an action upon it must, in the exercise of that jurisdiction, be guided by what are termed the curial rules of the lex fori, such as those which relate to procedure or to proof. Don v. Lippman (2), which is the leading Scottish authority upon the point, has settled that these rules include local laws relating to prescription or limitation. But all the rules, noticed by LORD BROUGHAM in his elaborate judgment as belonging to that class, refer to the action of the court in investigating the merits of a suit in which its jurisdiction has been already established. I can find no authority, and none was cited to us, to the effect that, in dealing with the prejudicial question whether it has jurisdiction to try the merits of the cause, the court ought to disregard an agreement to refer which is pars contractus, and binding according to the law of the contract, because it would not be valid if tested by the lex fori. Without clear authority I am not prepared to affirm a rule which does not appear to me to be recommended by any considerations of principle or expediency. One result of its adoption would be that, if two persons domiciled in England made a contract there, containing the same clause of reference which occurs in this case, either of them could avoid the reference by bringing an action before a Scottish court if the other happened to be temporarily resident in Scotland or to have personal estate in that country capable of being arrested.

The second reason advanced by the respondents, for denying effect to the reference, would have been more plausible if it had been the law of Scotland that no private agreement could exclude, to any extent, the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals. I am not disposed to hold that Scottish courts are bound to give effect to every stipulation in a foreign contract, unless it is shown to be contra bonos mores, in the sense of the law which they administer. There may be stipulations which, though not tainted with immorality, are yet in such direct conflict with deeply-rooted and important considerations of local policy, that her courts would be justified in declining to recognise them. But the law of Scotland has, from the earliest times, permitted private parties to exclude the merits of any dispute between them from the consideration of the court by simply naming their arbiter. The rule that a reference to arbiters not named cannot be enforced, does not appear to me to rest upon any essential considerations of public policy. Even if an opposite inference were deducible from the authorities which establish the rule, the rule has been so largely entrenched upon by the legislation of the last fifty years, both in general and in local and personal Acts, that I should hesitate to affirm that the policy upon which it was originally based could now be regarded as of cardinal importance.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be reversed, and the cause remitted, with directions to sist procedure in hoc statu, in order that the matters in dispute may be settled by arbitration, in terms of the contract. Such an order will leave the parties at liberty, in the course of the reference, to avail themselves of the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and will enable the Court of Session, in the event of any lapse of the reference, to try and dispose of the merits of the case.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur. The substantial question to be determined is whether the law of Scotland or the law of England is to be applied to the interpretation of the arbitration clause in question. One of the parties was a Scottish distiller, and the parties on the other side were merchants in London. The contract was made in England and was (apart from the arbitration clause) to be performed in Scotland. That clause is of the highest importance. There is no absolute rule of law as to the way in which the intention of the parties to a contract with reference to the law of a particular place is to be ascertained. Were it not for the arbitration clause I should assent to the conclusion that the parties contracted solely with a view to the application of the law of Scotland. Having regard, however, to the terms of that clause, I am led to the conclusion that the parties intended that it should be interpreted by the rules of the law of England alone. A contract which provides that disputes should be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, "in the usual way," distinctly introduces a reference to the well-known laws regulating such arbitrations, and these must be the laws of England. This interpretation gives due and full effect to every portion of the contract, whereas the arbitration clause becomes mere waste paper if it is held that the parties were contracting on the basis of the application of the laws of Scotland, which would at once refuse to acknowledge the full efficacy of a clause so framed. It is more reasonable to hold that the parties contracted with the common intention of giving entire effect to every clause, rather than of mutilating or destroying one of the most important provisions.

LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD MORRIS concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I also am of opinion that the appeal in this case should be sustained, and the decision complained of reversed for the reasons which have already been so fully stated that it would serve no good purpose to repeat them. From the terms in which the clause of reference is expressed, in a contract to which, it must be observed, a firm of merchants in London and carrying on business there, is one of the parties, I think it is to be inferred to be pars contractus that the agreement which it contained for the settlement of disputes which might arise out of the contract, was to be interpreted and governed by the law of England; and I am further of opinion that there are no such considerations of public policy at the basis of the rules of Scottish law in reference to the necessity of arbiters being named in order to create a binding obligation to refer, as can warrant the courts in Scotland, in an action brought there, in refusing to give effect to the law and practice as to arbitrations in England. In accordance with the ordinary practice in Scotland, I think that procedure in the present action should be stayed, to allow the arbitration to be proceeded with in England as provided by the contract.

TAYLOR v. MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAIL. CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.), November 3, 9, 1894]

Carriage of Passengers—Negligence—Injury to passenger—Contract by purchase of ticket—Action founded in tort.

Personal Injuries—Contract between parties for carriage of plaintiff—Action founded on tort.

The plaintiff bought a ticket enabling him to travel on the defendants' railway, and while he was entering a compartment of a railway carriage his thumb was crushed owing to the negligence of the defendants' porter in shutting the door. The plaintiff was awarded £20 damages in an action which was brought in the High Court. On taxation of the plaintiff's costs the question arose whether the action was one "founded on tort" or "founded on contract" within s. 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Held: even though the plaintiff had entered into a contract with the defendants by taking a ticket, his action for personal injury caused by the negligence or misfeasance of the defendants' servant was an action "founded on tort" and not one "founded on contract" within s. 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Notes. The County Courts Act, 1888, was repealed by the County Courts Act, 1934, itself repealed (except as to a few provisions) by the County Courts Act, 1959. Section 47 of this last Act, which now provides for the costs of actions of contract or tort commenced in the High Court which could have been commenced in the county court, draws no distinction between actions founded on contract and those founded on tort: see 30 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 134. This case was decided on the question whether the action brought in the High Court was one which was "founded on tort" or "founded on contract" for taxation of costs, and, although this distinction is now no longer of consequence, it is considered that a report of the case will be of use as showing that a carrier of passengers has a duty to take care irrespective of contract.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of WRIGHT, J., holding that, an action brought in the High Court by the plaintiff, a passenger on the defendants' railway, for damages for personal injury caused by the negligence of the defendants' employee, was an action "founded on contract" and not one "founded on tort" within s. 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and consequently, having been awarded £20 damages in the High Court action, the plaintiff was only entitled to costs on the county court scale. D

The plaintiff, a commercial traveller, alleged in his statement of claim that on May 6, 1894, he was a passenger on the defendants' railway, and was entering a compartment of a train at the defendants' station at Levenshulme, when a porter of the defendants negligently shut the door of the compartment upon and crushed the plaintiff's thumb; and that by the defendants' negligence the plaintiff suffered great pain, and was prevented from following his employment. The plaintiff obtained a verdict for £20 damages and judgment was entered in his favour for that amount and the costs of the action. Upon the taxation of the plaintiff's costs the question arose whether this action was properly attributable to the defendants' breach of contract in not conveying the plaintiff safely to his destination, or to negligence apart from contract; viz., whether the action ought to be regarded as "founded on tort" or "founded on contract," within the meaning of s. 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The master considered himself bound, by a decision of WRIGHT, J., at chambers upon a similar point in 1891, to hold that the action was founded on contract, and he, therefore, only allowed the plaintiff costs on the county court scale. The matter then came before WRIGHT, J., at chambers, who adhered to his previous decision. E

The plaintiff now appealed. F

Cur. adv. vult. H

Nov. 9, 1894. The following judgments were read. I

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an action brought in the High Court by the plaintiff, who was a passenger by the defendant company's railway. The action was brought to recover damages for an injury, that injury having been sustained by the negligence of the defendants' servant in slamming the door and jamming the plaintiff's hand. The plaintiff recovered a verdict for £20; and now comes the question about costs—whether he is entitled to his full costs or not. That depends upon

A s. 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. That section runs thus :

“With respect to any action brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court the following provisions shall apply : (1) If in an action founded on contract the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than £20 he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action, and if he shall recover a sum of £20 or upwards but less than £50, he shall not be entitled to any more costs than he would have been entitled to if the action had been brought in a county court. (2) If in an action founded on tort the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than £10 he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action; and if he shall recover a sum of £10 or upwards, but less than £20, he shall not be entitled to any more costs than he would have been entitled to if the action had been brought in a county court. . . .”

C If this action falls within the first clause, if it ought to be regarded as an action founded on contract, then the plaintiff can only get county court costs. If, on the other hand, the action falls within the second clause, that is to say, if it is an action founded on tort, then there would be nothing to qualify the plaintiff's right, he would get his full costs. We are driven, therefore, to consider whether, adopting the language of the Act, this action brought by the plaintiff is an action founded on contract or an action founded on tort.

D The language of the Act is a little peculiar. I need not go into the history of it; I merely observe that the classification which is made by the legislature is confined to actions brought in the High Court which might have been commenced in the county court, and those two subdivisions exhaust the whole of that class of actions, and each excludes the other. That gives rise to the difficulty here. We no longer have to consider forms of actions. We are, however, compelled by the legislature to put every action which can be brought in the county court, but is brought in the High Court, into one or the other of those two categories. Everyone who has studied the English law will know perfectly well that there is a debatable ground between torts and contracts. There are what are called quasi-contracts and quasi-torts; and it is sometimes not easy to say whether a cause is founded on contract or on tort. Very often you put it either way. But here we are compelled to draw the line hard and fast and put every one of the actions in one class or the other. I have looked into the authorities, but it is only necessary, as I propose to do, to refer to those cases which bear upon the true construction of this Act of Parliament. I do not think that anything would be gained now by going into the old learning about the forms of actions. We have to consider this Act of Parliament, and the only cases which are of any importance and assistance, as enabling us to construe the Act, are those cases which have been decided upon it or upon the similar Acts which this Act has replaced.

G First and foremost there is Bryant v. Herbert (1), decided in 1878; secondly, there is the case decided in 1877 of Pontifex v. Midland Rail. Co. (2); and then in the next year there was Fleming v. Manchester, Sheffield & Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (3). Having studied those cases with care (I do not think it necessary to go into them) it appears to me that this is an action founded on tort; and the conclusion to which I have arrived is based upon these reasons: That which caused the injury was not an act of omission; it was not a mere non-feasance. It was not merely the not taking such care of the plaintiff as by the contract the defendants were bound to take; but it was an act of misfeasance—it was positive negligence in jamming his hand. Contract or no contract, he could maintain an action for that. All he would have to prove would be that he was lawfully on the premises of the railway company, and the contract is merely a part of the history of the case. I do not think it would be possible without running contrary to the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in Bryant v. Herbert (1), which reversed the decision of DENMAN, J., and myself in the same case, to hold that within the meaning of the County Courts Act, 1888, this is an action founded on contract as distinguished from tort.

The case to which counsel for the defendants referred of Alton v. Midland Rail. Co. (4) at first appears to present some difficulty; but, in the first place, that case was not like this, and in the next place, it has been criticised and commented upon somewhat adversely; I do not say it has been overruled—that is quite another matter. But it is not a case on the construction of this Act, and, therefore, I prefer to base my decision on what I consider to be the true construction of the Act in this case. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that this appeal ought to be allowed; and the plaintiff will have his costs here and below.

A. L. SMITH L.J.—The question is, whether, when a passenger contracts with a railway company (i.e., takes a ticket) entitling him to be carried upon a given journey, and he is injured therein by a misfeasance for which the company is liable, and he brings an action, therefore, in the High Court, such action is founded upon contract or founded upon tort within the meaning of s. 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, for by that section different consequences arise as to costs if the action is founded upon contract or if founded upon tort. It has been held by this court that, in considering a matter of costs under sections similar to the present, the substance of the action and not its form is to be looked at, and it should be ascertained whether the real substantial complaint is for breach of contract or for tort: see Bryant v. Herbert (1). It is not disputed that, as a matter of pleading, a plaintiff for a cause of action such as the present may declare in either contract or tort, but this is not the governing consideration.

It is clear that a person lawfully upon railway premises may maintain an action against a railway company for injuries sustained while there by reason of the active negligence of the company's servants, whether he has a contract with the company or not: Marshall v. York, Newcastle and Berwick Rail. Co. (5); Austin v. Great Western Rail. Co. (6); and Foulkes v. Metropolitan Rail. Co. (7). And he need not allege or prove any contract at all; he need only allege and prove that he was lawfully where he was, and was then injured by the active negligence of the company's servants; for this is sufficient to show a breach of that duty on the part of the defendants which is implied by law. It is equally clear that in such an action, whether the plaintiff sets up a contract or not, to succeed he must prove active negligence, i.e., a misfeasance of the company's servants, and that in the proof of this negligence he will undoubtedly fail. The fact that the plaintiff happens to have a contract, i.e., a ticket, is of use in such an action it is true, for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff was lawfully where he was when he sustained the injury. But proof of this fact can be given aliunde, and proof of a contract is by no means vital to success.

BRAMWELL, L.J., in Bryant v. Herbert (1) says—and in this I agree—that the foundation of an action are those facts which it is necessary to state and prove to maintain it, and no others. On the other hand, if the action be brought against a common carrier for non-delivery of goods, that is founded upon contract, as was held by this court in Fleming v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (8), and negligence need not be averred and proved. So also if brought for a non-feasance, for then the plaintiff cannot succeed until proof of a contract and its breach. Alton v. Midland Rail. Co. (4), so much relied upon by the defendants, was decided upon demurrer to a declaration in which it was expressly averred that the rights of the servant for whose injuries the master was therein suing the company were founded upon contract, and this was taken as the premiss upon which the case had to be decided, and it was then held that the master could not sue for injury to his servant caused by breach of a contract entered into between the servant and the company. No question was or could be raised as to what would have been the result if the servant's remedy against the company had been founded upon tort, for the case as before stated was decided upon demurrer to a declaration which expressly averred that the servant's rights against the company were founded upon contract. This case, when looked into, is not the authority which it was supposed to be, and in no way decides that an action brought for personal injury

A against a company by a passenger who has taken a ticket is necessarily an action founded upon contract and not upon tort.

The judgments of BRAMWELL and BRETT, L.JJ., in the before-mentioned case of Bryant v. Herbert (1), are very pertinent to this case, and having considered them and the other cases cited therein, and especially Pontifex v. Midland Rail. Co. (2), and for the reasons above, I hold that an action against a railway company for personal injuries by reason of the active neglect of the company's servant, even though the plaintiff has taken a ticket, is an action founded upon tort and not upon contract within s. 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. I may add that, having consulted the senior master of the Common Law Division, I find that this judgment is in accord with the mode of taxation hitherto adopted in the division. For the reasons above this appeal must be allowed and the plaintiff will have his costs here and at chambers.

Estate Duty—Property passing on death—Property deemed to pass—Personal property—Gift of mortgage debt—Annuity reserved to donor—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict., c. 12), s. 38 (2) (a)—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict., c. 7), s. 11 (1).

A sum of £23,925 was due to a father on a mortgage of land, and he had obtained a decree of foreclosure which had not become absolute. A deed was executed whereby the mortgagors conveyed the equity of redemption to the father's son in consideration of £525. The father conveyed the legal estate to his son and released the mortgage debt, and his son covenanted to pay his father an annuity of £735. The son paid this annuity until the death of his father.

Held: the transaction was a gift of personal property within s. 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889; the son had not obtained the enjoyment of what was given free from a contractual benefit to his father which encumbered the enjoyment of what was given; and accordingly, on the death of the father, the son was liable to pay duty under s. 38 (2) (a) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as extended by s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1889.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Divisional Court (MATHEW and CAVE, JJ.), made on an English information, giving judgment for the Crown and that the defendant was liable to pay account duty.

By a deed made in 1886, between James Worrall, the father of the defendant, of the first part, Mary Shield, of the second part, Robert Shield, of the third part, and the defendant, of the fourth part, reciting that the hereditaments mentioned in the deed had been mortgaged to James Worrall for £26,150, of which £23,925 remained due and owing, and that the defendant had agreed to purchase from Robert Shield the hereditaments for £24,500, and that James Worrall had agreed to join in the conveyance for the purpose of releasing the premises from the mortgage debt in consideration of the covenant on the part of the defendant thereafter contained, in consideration of £525 paid by the defendant to Mary Shield, and in further consideration of the covenant on the part of the defendant thereafter contained, such covenant being accepted by James Worrall in satisfaction of his mortgage debt of £23,925 from which he thereby released Mary and Robert Shield and the defendant, the hereditaments were conveyed to the defendant in fee simple discharged from the mortgage. The defendant covenanted with James Worrall to pay him during his life or to his assigns the yearly sum of £735 half-yearly. Before this transaction was carried out James Worrall had obtained a decree for foreclosure which had not yet become absolute. The Crown claimed that the transaction carried out by the deed, between James Worrall and the defendant, was one of gift and not of purchase, and James Worrall thereby gave the defendant the mortgage debt belonging to him, reserving a benefit by way of contract to the extent of the annuity of £735 during his life, and the defendant acquired and retained possession of the subject-matter of such gift accordingly.

James Worrall died in 1890, and a claim was made against the defendant for account stamp duty on the above sum of £23,925 under the provisions of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38 (2) (a), as extended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11 (1). A claim was also made for estate duty under the provisions of s. 5, sub-ss. (2), (4) and (5) of the Act of 1889. The defendant admitted the deed and alleged that the transaction was one of purchase and not of gift. He had taken possession of the hereditaments, and had paid the annuity during his father's life.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C.) and Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The first question which we have to determine is, what was in truth and substance the real transaction in this case. In my opinion the best way to find that out is to consider the matter as if there were no deeds at all. Looking, then, at the facts of the case, the transaction appears to have been as

A follows. The father was owned £23,925 upon a mortgage of land. The mortgagors retained the equity of redemption, and the mortgagee had only the security of the land. The mortgagee had a right to claim foreclosure if he were not repaid, and so to get the land absolutely as his own. He had a son, and either wished to benefit him or to get rid of the burden of the land by transferring it to him. He, therefore, resolved to give to his son that mortgage debt of £23,925. He could not give the money because he had not got it. As to the land, he had only a right to a foreclosure absolute if he were not paid. His rights, therefore, were personal property. It was arranged that he should give the money to his son, and that his son should buy the equity of redemption. The father, however, wanted to have an annuity equal to about 3 per cent. on the money, and the son agreed to give him an annuity of £735. The whole of that arrangement was carried out by a deed. The equity of redemption was conveyed by the mortgagors to the son, and the father conveyed the legal estate to the son and released the mortgage debt; the son covenanted to pay his father an annuity of £735.

The law is that we are to look at the truth and substance of the transaction. That being so, does this case come within s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881? Personal property only is within the earlier Act of 1881. Then s. 11 (1) of the later Act of 1889 provides that

“... property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise,”

E shall be liable to duty under the Act of 1881. There was then in this case a gift of personal property from the father to the son; and, in my opinion, there was not an exclusion of the father from all “benefit to him by contract or otherwise.” There was this contract by which the son was to pay the annuity of £735 to the father. This case, therefore, is within the statute, and this property is liable to probate duty. The appeal fails and must be dismissed.

F LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is perfectly clear that in questions of this kind the court must look at the substance and not at the form of the transaction. In this case I think that, whether we look at the substance or at the form of the transaction, the Crown must succeed. Three questions have been raised. The first question is whether this was a gift at all. It is said that it was not, because of the covenant to pay the annuity. It appears to me to be none the less a gift because there was this covenant to pay an annuity. It was still a gift. G The second question is whether this was a gift of personal property. The defendant contends that, if this was a gift at all, it was a gift of real property. It is essential to consider the facts as they existed at the date of the deed, in order to determine whether this was a gift of personal property or not. Under the circumstances of the case it is impossible to say that the father gave the land to his son. H The land was not his to give. He gave the mortgage debt to his son, and the gift was, therefore, one of personal property. If the father had not made this deed, and had died before the foreclosure was made absolute, his executors would have been entitled to this money, and that shows that this was personal property.

I The third question is whether this was a gift within the terms of s. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, and s. 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889. Section 38 (2) (a) of the earlier Act of 1881 provides that duty shall be payable on personal property, which shall include “Any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made ... and not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right, by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property.”

That was passed to prevent evasions of probate duty. Under that section the reservation to the donor must have been a reservation out of the property given. Then s. 11 (1) of the later Act of 1889 was passed to remedy that defect, and it provides that s. 38 of the Act of 1881 shall be amended so as to include

“property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained, to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise.”

Under s. 11 (1), therefore, it is no longer necessary that the reservation or benefit to the donor should be out of the property given. In the present case is it possible to say that no benefit has been reserved to the donor? It is clear to me that there is reserved such a benefit as is contemplated by s. 11 (1). The judgment of the Divisional Court was right and must be affirmed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This appeal must be dismissed. The question raised is, whether the defendant is liable to pay probate duty upon certain property. The answer to that question depends, first, upon whether this property is personalty or realty. I am satisfied that the Divisional Court rightly decided that it was personalty. The transaction was as follows: The father was owed £23,925 upon the security of a mortgage of land, and had obtained a foreclosure decree which had not become absolute. Then the land was conveyed to the son by the deed which has been considered. I am of opinion, therefore, that that which passed from the father to the son was personal property. Then it was contended that this was not a gift at all within the meaning of the Act, because consideration was given, and there cannot be a gift if consideration is given. I think, however, that s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1889 contemplates gifts for which a consideration may have been given. Then it is said that, even if this were a gift of personal property, yet no benefit was reserved to the donor out of the property itself, and that, therefore, this gift was not within s. 11 (1). I do not so read s. 11 (1). The words of the subsection are,

These words were, I think, expressly intended to enlarge the effect of s. 38 of the Act of 1881, and to include the reservation of a benefit of this kind. The appeal must be dismissed.

SMURTHWAITE AND OTHERS v. HANNAY AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Herschell, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Ashbourne, Lord Macnaghten and Lord Russell), June 21, 22, August 3, 1894]

[Reported [1894] A.C. 494; 63 L.J.Q.B. 737; 71 L.T. 157; 43 W.R. 113; 10 T.L.R. 649; 7 Asp.M.L.C. 485; 6 R. 299]

Practice—Irregularity under rules—Application to set aside proceedings—Joinder of plaintiffs with causes of action separate and distinct causes of action—R.S.C., Ord. 70, r. 1.

Shipping—Cargo—Delivery—Several shippers—Part of cargo unidentifiable on delivery—Shippers owners in common in proportion to respective interests.

Each of nine shippers shipped bales of cotton, in varying quantities under separate bills of lading, on board the same ship and bound for the same port. When the ship arrived at the port the total number of bales landed fell short by eighteen of the total in the bills of lading. Fifteen of the landed bales were unidentifiable, having had their distinctive marks and numbers obliterated. The fifteen landed bales were sold and the proceeds distributed proportionately among the several consignees. The several shippers and consignees joined as plaintiffs in one action against the defendants, the shipowners, on the bills of lading for damages for short delivery.

Held: (i) the plaintiffs, each of whom had a claim arising under a separate contract, had different causes of action and were not entitled to be joined under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1 [as it then stood]; (ii) the joinder of plaintiffs in a way not authorised by R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1, was more than an irregularity under R.S.C., Ord. 70, r. 1, so that the defendants were not out of time under r. 2, and could take the objection after appearance; (iii) (per LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN) when the bales of cotton became unidentifiable, the several owners became owners in common in proportion to their respective interests and the shipowners could only attribute such proportion in answer to any claim for non-delivery.

Notes. In this case the decision as to joinder of plaintiffs was made under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1, as it then stood. As from Oct. 26, 1896, when this rule was amended, it can no longer be said that Ord. 16, r. 1, relates only to parties and not to joinder of action and the joinder disallowed in this case would now be allowed: see Ord. 16, r. 1, as amended, see the ANNUAL PRACTICE (1963) 301. This case, however, is reported as it is considered that it will be of use on the other two points.

The House took time for consideration.

The following opinions were read. D

Aug. 3, 1894. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The appellants are the owners of a vessel called the Castleton. The respondents shipped certain cotton on board that vessel for carriage from a foreign port to Liverpool. On arrival at that port it was found that the marks of fifteen bales had been obliterated, and that the total number which arrived was less by eighteen than the number which, according to the bills of lading, had been shipped. Thereupon the present action was brought, the plaintiffs being the several holders of the bills of lading, either as shippers or as indorsees from shippers, who had not received delivery of the number of bales specified in their bills of lading respectively. E

On the question whether such an action can be maintained there has been a great difference of judicial opinion. MATHEW, J., refused to stay the action. DAY and HENN COLLINS, JJ., in the Queen's Bench Division, took a different view, but their judgment was reversed by LORD ESHER, M.R., and KAY, L.J., BOWEN, L.J., dissenting. It is admitted that the claims of the plaintiffs are several, that they have no joint cause of action or claim to relief, and that before the Judicature Act they could not have been joined as plaintiffs in such an action as the present; but it is contended that R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1, justifies the course which has been pursued in making them co-plaintiffs. The argument of the learned counsel for the respondents went this length, that the rule sanctions the joinder of any number of plaintiffs, however distinct the causes of action in respect of which they are suing, subject only to this, that any defendant alleging that several causes of action have been united which cannot conveniently be disposed of together may, under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 8, apply for an order confining the action to such of the causes of action as can be conveniently disposed of together. If the argument be a sound one it cannot, in my opinion, stop short of the point to which the learned counsel pressed it. LORD ESHER, M.R., thought a more limited construction might be put upon the rule, that, large as the words of the rule were, if the causes of action vested in the plaintiffs respectively were not merely separate causes of action, but were in respect of utterly distinct and different transactions, then the plaintiffs could not join in one action in respect of them. F
I

I am unable, with all deference, to find anything in the language of the rule to justify drawing such a line, nor can I see how it could in practice be drawn. Take the facts of the present case as an illustration. In what sense can it be said with accuracy that the different causes of action all arise out of the same transaction? The claim is in each case in respect of a breach of a separate contract to deliver the goods shipped. Whether the goods, the non-delivery of which is complained

A of, were in fact shipped depends in each case upon a different set of circumstances. The several consignments may have been and probably were delivered to the shipowner by different persons, at different times, and under different circumstances. They were, it is true, delivered for carriage in the same ship and were goods of the same description. But I cannot see that this makes the transaction one any more than if goods consigned by different persons had been intended for carriage by different ships and had been of a different description. Precisely the same controversy, requiring just the same proof, might have arisen in the one case as in the other. And if the one case be within the rule I see nothing in its terms to exclude the other.

C Order 16, r. 1, purports to deal merely with the parties to an action, and has, I think, no reference to the joinder of several causes of action. This subject is dealt with in Ord. 18. Yet, if I correctly understand the argument of the respondents, the construction they put upon Ord. 16 necessarily deals with the joinder of several causes of action, and confers, without reference to any other order or rule, the right "to unite in the same action several causes of action." For, if it sanctions the joining of plaintiffs having separate and distinct causes of action, this involves of necessity the union in one action of several causes of action.

D Order 16, r. 1, provides that

"all persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative."

E This conveys to my mind the idea that the relief claimed by the plaintiffs who are joined is to be the same relief, especially when I consider that the rule only relates to the parties to an action, and that the right to join more than one cause of action is regulated by another rule. But for the use of the word "severally," I do not think any doubt would have been entertained that this was the true construction. There was naturally much discussion as to the meaning and effect of that word. In construing these rules it must always be borne in mind that before the passing of the Judicature Act the practice and procedure of the Court of Chancery and

F the courts of common law differed in many respects. It was a leading object of the rules framed under that Act to formulate a code of procedure which should in general be applicable to the Common Law and Chancery Divisions of the High Court alike. There can be no doubt that in the Court of Chancery there were many cases in which co-plaintiffs might severally be entitled to the same relief, and might, before the Judicature Act, have been properly joined, although their

G claim was neither joint nor alternative. There is, therefore, no difficulty in satisfying every word of the rule by the construction which I have suggested, and it, I confess, appears to me the natural one.

H It cannot be doubted that, whatever construction is put upon the rule I have been considering, it must be applied equally to r. 4 of Ord. 16. The result of the respondents' contention would be that any number of plaintiffs might join together to sue any number of defendants in respect of causes of action not common to either plaintiffs or defendants. There are other rules of Ord. 16 which seem to me to militate against this contention. It is difficult to understand how there could ever be a "misjoinder" if such a procedure were authorised. And what is the use of r. 6, which enables a plaintiff,

I "at his option, to join as parties to the same action all or any of the persons severally or jointly and severally liable on any one contract..."

if the previous rules have the effect contended for? I do not pause to discuss the question whether the construction contended for by the appellants or by the respondents would be found to provide the more convenient procedure. I have endeavoured to construe the rule apart from such considerations, but this much I may say, that I am far from satisfied that the balance of convenience is, as the respondents contend, on their side. I cannot accede to the arguments urged for the respondents that, even if the joinder of the plaintiffs in one action was not warranted by the rule relied on, this was a mere irregularity of which the appellants, A by virtue of Ord. 70, r. 1, r. 2, could not now take advantage. If unwarranted by any enactment or rule, it is, in my opinion, much more than an irregularity.

Before concluding I ought to refer to Booth v. Briscoe (1) which was much relied on by the respondents. The plaintiffs who were joined in that action sued in respect of a libel impugning the management of an institution of which they were the trustees. No objection was taken to the constitution of the action. They B recovered joint damages. In the Court of Appeal BRAMWELL, L.J., intimated an opinion that their causes of action were several, and that the damages should have been several also. But he thought that they might, nevertheless, under the circumstances, properly be joined. It is not necessary to determine whether that case was rightly decided. It is enough to say that it was a very different one from the present. I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be C reversed, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division restored, and that the respondents should pay the costs here and below.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN.—In this case the respondents, the plaintiffs D below, sue the appellants, the defendants below, for non-delivery of certain bales of cotton shipped in the defendant's steamship Castleton at Galveston for carriage to Liverpool. The plaintiffs consist of sixteen firms or persons, nine of whom are alleged to have been shippers and seven consignees of the cotton in question. The defendants have pleaded several defences, the principal defence apparently being E that the bales of cotton claimed were never shipped, or received for shipment, on board the defendants' ship. The facts alleged in the pleadings, so far as they are material, are as follows: Each of the nine shippers shipped bales of cotton, in varying quantities, on board the Castleton, receiving separate bills of lading therefor. The facts common to all the shipments were: that the shipments consisted of bales of cotton; that they were laden on board the same ship (which was a general ship); that they were consigned to the same port; and that the bills of F lading were similar in all respects material in this case. When the ship arrived at Liverpool it was found that the total number of bales landed fell short of the total number in the bills of lading by eighteen. Further, it was found in the case of fifteen of the landed bales that their distinctive marks and numbers had been obliterated, and that they were unidentifiable. Those fifteen bales had been sold, and it is stated that their proceeds have been distributed proportionately among G the several consignees.

In this state of things the plaintiffs joined in bringing the present action. The defendants objected to the joinder of the plaintiffs in one action, and contended that each plaintiff was bound to bring a separate action in respect of his shipment or consignment, as being a separate and distinct cause of action. On June 1, 1893, H MATHEW, J., made an order refusing an application to stay the action; but on appeal from that refusal DAY and HENN COLLINS, JJ., on June 30, 1893, made an order that all further proceedings should be stayed, or the action dismissed, on the ground that the plaintiffs should have brought separate actions in respect of their respective claims, and further ordered that the plaintiffs should elect as to the claim to be proceeded with. Upon appeal had from the last-mentioned order, LORD ESHER, M.R., and KAY, L.J. (BOWEN, L.J., dissenting) gave judgment I reversing the order of the Divisional Court, and thereby allowed the action to proceed. From that judgment the present appeal is brought.

The question thus raised before your Lordships turns upon the proper construction of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1. That rule provides that:

"All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. And judgment may be given for such one or more of the plaintiffs as may be found to be entitled to relief, for such relief as he or they may be entitled to,

A without any amendment. But the defendant, though unsuccessful, shall be entitled to his costs occasioned by so joining any person who shall not be found entitled to relief, unless the court or a judge in disposing of the costs shall otherwise direct."

B The Master of the Rolls thought that, grammatically construed, the order was wide enough in its terms to permit of the joining of any number of plaintiffs, although their causes of action related to entirely distinct and different transactions; but he thought that, in order to prevent the absurdity which he considered might arise from that wide construction, the rule ought to be construed with this limitation: namely, that although several plaintiffs with different and distinct causes of action might be joined together in one action, their causes of action must arise out of the same transaction. Further, he arrived at the conclusion that, although the plaintiffs in this case have different causes of action, they are causes of action which did arise out of the same transaction, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were here properly joined.

C It seems to me that a serious ambiguity lies in the use of the words "same transaction" as here applied. I think that the causes of action here did not arise out of the same transaction. They arose out of similar but entirely distinct transactions, creating similar but entirely distinct legal liabilities. The goods of the several plaintiffs were, no doubt, sent in the same ship from the same port of shipment to the same port of discharge, and in that sense the plaintiffs may be said to have been parties to the same transaction, but in that sense only. The property in the goods was distinct in the case of each shipper, and the contracts of carriage were likewise distinct. There was no community of interest or of property as between the plaintiffs. In truth, the transaction was not one and the same. There were several transactions, similar indeed, but different and distinct from one another.

D KAY, L.J., was of opinion that if Ord. 16, r. 1, stood alone, the joining under one writ here attempted of several plaintiffs with distinct and separate causes of action was not authorised by the rule; but he thought that Ord. 18, r. 1, did authorise such joining, subject to the power of the court or of a judge to intervene where considerations of convenience justified it. I cannot assent to this view. Order 16 is conversant with a subject-matter different from that dealt with by Ord. 18. Order 16 (principally in r. 1 and r. 4) deals with the parties to an action; but, in my judgment, Ord. 18 deals and deals only with the causes of action which may be joined together in an action properly constituted, as to parties, under Ord. 16.

E BOWEN, L.J., dissented from the view taken by the other members of the court, and I concur both in the reasons of that learned judge and in the conclusions at which he arrived. I cannot agree with the Master of the Rolls in the limitation which, to avoid an absurdity, he introduces in the construction of r. 1 of Ord. 16—namely, the limitation that the plaintiffs shall have been concerned in the same transaction. I find no such words of limitation either in r. 1 of Ord. 16, dealing with plaintiffs, or in r. 4, of the same order, dealing with defendants; and, therefore, it seems to me that the only two possible constructions are those which were, in fact, the contentions of counsel at the Bar for the appellants and for the respondents respectively.

H For the respondents it was broadly contended that any number of plaintiffs, with any number of distinct causes of action, might join in one action within the meaning of the rule, subject only to the control of the court or of a judge. I must dissent from this view. Indeed, if r. 1 is to have this wide construction, r. 4 must receive an equally wide construction. R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 4, provides as follows:

I "All persons may be joined as defendants against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. And judgment may be given against such one or more of the defendants as may be found liable, according to their respective liabilities, without any amendment."

According to this broad contention, therefore, it would be possible to join any number of plaintiffs with distinct causes of action against any number of defendants charged on distinct grounds of liability. On the other hand, it was contended for the appellants that the plaintiffs, who alone can be joined in one action under Ord. 16, r. 1, are plaintiffs in whom, or in some of whom, not any, but the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist. In my judgment, this is the true construction. In other words, the rule applies to cases where it is doubtful in which of the plaintiffs, or in what number of the plaintiffs, and whether jointly or severally, the legal right to relief exists, and also to cases (more frequent in the Chancery than in the common law courts) in which several plaintiffs having separate rights claim the same relief. This view is strengthened by the fact that several of the rules, following r. 1 and r. 4 of Ord. 16 and r. 1 of Ord. 18, would have been unnecessary were the true construction the wide one contended for by the respondents. It is not unimportant to observe that r. 11 of Ord. 16, which deals with misjoinder, only enables the court or a judge to deal with the names of parties "improperly joined"; but it is difficult to see, if the construction of r. 1 contended for by the respondents be right, how there could be a misjoinder of plaintiffs. On the other hand, Ord. 18, r. 11, dealing with joinder of causes of action, gives the court or a judge power to limit the joinder of causes upon considerations of convenience alone.

It was suggested at the Bar that, if this action were not allowed to proceed as now constituted, each plaintiff suing separately would be placed in a position of difficulty, because, it was urged, the defendants might attribute the unmarked bales, or a sufficient number of them, to the particular plaintiff suing, and so meet his claim. But this is not so. When the bales became unidentifiable, the several owners of cotton became, in point of law, owners in common of them in proportion to their respective interests, and the shipowner could only attribute such proportion in answer to any claim for non-delivery: Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (2). The argument of convenience was strongly pressed upon your Lordships. I am by no means certain that that argument has, in the facts of this case, much weight; but whether it has or has not, it cannot be regarded if, as I think, the Orders and rules do not authorise that joinder of plaintiffs which has been here attempted.

A brief reference to the authorities is sufficient. As to Booth v. Briscoe (1), it is only necessary to say that, assuming that case to have been rightly decided, which it is not necessary to determine here, it differs widely from the present one, and it is no authority for the respondents' contention. That was a case in which the plaintiffs, managers of an asylum, brought an action in respect of a libel which did not reflect upon them individually or by name, but upon the management. They brought a joint action, and recovered joint damages. No objection was taken to the constitution of the action until the matter came before the Supreme Court after trial, and LORD BRAMWELL came to the conclusion, in the circumstances I have mentioned, that, as the complaint was of one and the same wrong, they might be joined as co-plaintiffs. In Gort v. Rowney (3) two plaintiffs suing together claimed relief in respect of separate and distinct causes of action. No objection was taken to the constitution of the action, which was referred to arbitration upon the terms that the costs were to abide the event; and the sole point to be determined was the question what was the event upon which the costs depended. Certain dicta of the Master of the Rolls in that case were relied upon by the respondents before your Lordships. But those dicta were not assented to by BOWEN, L.J., and were, in fact, not necessary for the decision of the question at issue.

A further point was taken at the Bar on the part of the respondents, namely, that the joinder of the plaintiffs in a way not authorised by Ord. 16 was a mere irregularity, and that the appellants came too late to take advantage of it (Ord. 70, r. 2). This objection is not, in my judgment, well founded. In my judgment such joinder of plaintiffs is more than an irregularity; it is the constitution of a

A suit as to parties in a way not authorised by the law and the rules applicable to procedure; and, apart altogether from any express power given by the rules, it is fully within the competence of the court to restrain and to prevent an abuse of its process. On the whole, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellants with costs.

G

By s. 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, which was incorporated in the private Act of the appellant company, it was provided that a local authority might, after the expiration of twenty-one years from the construction of a tramway, by notice in writing require the promoters of the tramway to sell to them their undertaking "upon terms of paying the then value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale, or other consideration whatsoever), of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters... such value to be in case of difference determined by" a referee nominated by the Board of Trade.

H

Held (LORD ASHBOURNE dissenting): in valuing a tramway under that section the arbitrator was not entitled to take into account the profits or the rental value of the undertaking at the date of the sale, but the proper value of the tramway was such sum as it would cost to construct and establish the tramway at that date, subject to a proper deduction for depreciation, the fact that the tramway was then successfully constructed and in complete working condition being taken into account.

I

Per LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.: The word "tramway" in the Tramways Act, 1870, s. 43, means the structure laid down on the highway and nothing more. The word may, no doubt, without impropriety be held to include all proprietary rights attached to it, but I do not think that it can with propriety be held to comprise all the powers in relation to the tramway which are conferred by the statute on the promoters.

July 30, 1894. The following opinions were read.

A LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The appellant company was formed under the provisions of a private Act of Parliament in the year 1871. This Act incorporated Part 2 and Part 3 of the Tramways Act, 1870. Section 43 of that Act entitled the respondents within six months after the expiration of a period of twenty-one years from the time when the appellants were empowered to construct the tramway, by notice in writing, to require the appellants to sell their undertaking. They

B accordingly, on Aug. 12, 1892, gave notice to the appellants that, in exercise of their rights under that section, they would purchase the appellants' undertaking within the city of Edinburgh. The appellants and respondents having differed as to the price to be paid, the Board of Trade appointed Mr. Henry Tennant, of York, as referee, to fix what the price should be. In the narrative of the award or decree arbitral, which he made, Mr. Tennant stated that, in his opinion, after careful

C consideration of the terms of s. 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, in valuing the tramways, he was not entitled to take into account the present profits or rental value of the undertaking, but that the proper value of the tramways to be determined by him, according to his construction of the statute, was such sum as it would cost to construct and establish the same under deduction of a proper sum in respect of depreciation for their present condition, and that in estimating such cost he

D was entitled to take into account the fact that the tramways were then successfully constructed, and in complete working condition. The present conjoined actions were thereupon raised by the appellants against the respondents for the purpose of reducing Mr. Tennant's award or decree arbitral, upon the ground that his view of s. 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, was erroneous, and for declarator that he ought, under that section, to have fixed the value to be paid by the respondents

E for the tramways upon the rental basis, and for an order on him to proceed with the reference, and to find and declare the value of the tramway lines according to their rental value. Both the Lord Ordinary and the First Division of the Inner House have held Mr. Tennant's award to be good, and have assoilzied the respondents.

The question on this appeal, is whether these decisions were correct. The question turns on the construction to be put upon the language employed in s. 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, which prescribes the terms upon which the promoters of a tramway (in this case the appellants) are to sell their undertaking to the local authority. The words are as follows :

G "...upon terms of paying the then value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale, or other consideration whatsoever) of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking..."

It is contended, on behalf of the appellants, that the value of the tramway must be ascertained by taking into consideration what rental could be obtained for it if let with all the statutory rights of using it possessed by the promoters, and then allowing whatever may be thought the proper number of years' purchase of the rental which could thus be obtained. The sum so arrived at, it was argued, would represent the then value of the tramway within the meaning of the section.

I Before discussing the language used by the legislature, it is, I think, necessary to consider the nature of the rights and powers of the promoters which it is said are to be thus taken into account, and the manner in which they are conferred upon them. The promoters obtained authority, in the first place, to interfere with public highways by laying down tramways upon them, and maintaining the tramways so laid down. But the most important power which they obtained was that contained in s. 34 of the Tramways Act, 1870, which authorised them to use upon the tramways so laid down carriages with flanged wheels, or wheels suitable only to run on the rails prescribed by their Act, and provided that, subject to the provisions of their special Act and of that Act, the promoters and their lessees should have the exclusive use of their tramways for carriages with flanged wheels or other wheels suitable only to run on the prescribed rail. It will be seen that the power thus conferred is limited to the promoters and their lessees, the promoters being the persons or company authorised to construct the tramways. The right conferred is a personal one, and cannot be claimed by any persons who do not come within the designation of promoters or lessees of promoters. It is not conferred upon the promoters' assignees. A conveyance, therefore, by the promoters of their tramways, or even of their undertaking, would not carry with it the right to the statutory monopoly conferred upon the promoters by the section to which I have referred. A

I proceed now to consider the words of the provision upon which the question at issue turns. It is to be observed that, although the undertaking is described as the subject of the sale, it is to be sold, not upon terms of paying its then value, but upon terms of paying "the then value of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, material, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking." It appears clear that the word "tramway" cannot be read as synonymous with "undertaking." The words which follow "tramway" are, to my mind, conclusive upon this point. What, then, does "tramway" mean as used in the section? I have examined every instance of its use in the statute, and it appears to me in every other case, at all events, to be used to describe the structure laid down on the highway, and nothing more, and I cannot see my way to give any other meaning to it in the section under consideration. The word "tramway" may, no doubt, without impropriety be held to include all proprietary rights attached to it; but I do not think that it can with propriety be held to comprise all the powers in relation to the tramway which are conferred by the statute upon the promoters. I have already pointed out that the power exclusively to use the tramway was granted to the promoters as such, and is not capable of transfer by them. This is distinctly recognised by the provision in s. 43 which immediately follows that under consideration. It is provided that, when a sale has been made, all the rights, powers, and authorities of the promoters in respect to the undertaking sold shall be transferred to, vested in, and may be exercised by the authority to whom the same has been sold in like manner as if the tramway was constructed by such authority under the powers conferred upon them by a provisional order under the Act, and in reference to the same they shall be deemed to be the promoters. B C D E F

It is by virtue of this enactment, and of this alone, that the local authority becomes entitled to the exclusive use of the tramway, which was previously vested in the promoters. It is the statute, and not the company which originally constructed the tramways, which confers upon the local authority this right. It is also worthy of note that some, if not all of the rights, powers, and authorities of the promoters are treated as not included even in the term "undertaking," inasmuch as they are spoken of as the rights, powers, and authorities of the promoters "in respect to the undertaking sold." G

I have so far dealt with the language of the section, without taking into consideration the words within the parenthesis upon which so much of the argument turned. What was to be paid by the purchasers was the then value of the tramway "exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale, or other consideration whatsoever." It was contended for the appellants that the presence of the parenthesis indicated that in the opinion of the legislature the term "value of the tramway" would, but for the words in the parenthesis, have justified an allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, and must, therefore, include something more than the value of the structure. I cannot assent to this argument. The words of the parenthesis may well have been enacted by way of precaution to make sure that countenance was not given to any contention which would have involved fixing a sum in excess of the value of the structure. There is, I think, a fallacy involved in considering the meaning of the words which follow the parenthesis by themselves, and then inquiring how far the meaning attributed to them is to be modi- H I

A filed by reason of the words which precede. Each part of the provision throws light on the other. It is by reading it as a whole that the intention of the legislature is to be ascertained. The words found within the parenthesis, to my mind, support the view that "tramway" is to be construed in the manner which I have indicated, and not in that contended for by the appellants.

B It is said that the words "exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking" were introduced for the purpose of preventing the arbitrator making any addition to the value otherwise arrived at in respect of such profit. I find it difficult to understand how it could ever be supposed that an arbitrator would make any addition to the value of the tramway in respect of the past profits of the undertaking, or how it could ever have been thought necessary to prohibit his doing so. It is, however, quite intelligible that it might be thought necessary to
C guard against his allowing for, or, in other words, taking into account, past profits in arriving at the value of the tramway. But if the word "allowance" is used in this sense in relation to past profits, its meaning must be the same in relation to future profits. I, therefore, construe the words as enacting that neither the profits made in the past nor to be anticipated in the future were to be taken into account in assessing the value.

D It was argued that, if the value of the tramway were arrived at by taking so many years' purchase of the rental which could have been obtained for it if let, no profits would be allowed for in the value so ascertained. I am unable to adopt this view. How would it be possible to determine the rental which could be obtained except by reference to the profits which had been or which might be made? The rent which a tenant would be prepared to give would obviously depend
E upon the profits to be anticipated. It was further argued that the legislature had only excluded an allowance for past or future and not for present profits. Why, it was asked, if all profits were to be excluded, were the words "past or future" inserted? To my mind, the words cover all profits whether made or to be made. And the reason for their insertion appears to me plain. If the word "profits" alone had been used it would have been open to contention that only profits
F actually made were referred to, and that the provision did not exclude an allowance for profits to be anticipated in the future. Reading the enactment as a whole, I can find no indication, but quite the contrary, that the arbitrator, in determining the then value of the tramway, was to take into account those rights and powers which had been possessed by the promoters as such by virtue of the statute, and would be thereafter by the same statute conferred upon the local
G authority.

Reliance was placed by the appellants upon the provisions of ss. 41 and 42 of the Tramways Act, 1870, enabling the Board of Trade, if the promoters discontinued the working of their tramway, or were insolvent, to declare that their powers in respect of the tramway should be at an end. In the first of these cases, the Board of Trade were empowered to declare the powers of the promoters at an
H end from the date of the order; in the latter, at the expiration of six months from the making of the order, but in both cases it is provided that the powers of the promoters shall thereupon cease and determine, "unless the same are purchased by the local authority in manner by this Act provided." Inasmuch as s. 43 applies to a purchase by the local authority within three months after any order made by the Board of Trade under either of the two preceding sections, it was contended
I that this showed that the purchase of the undertaking was regarded by the legislature as a purchase of the powers of the promoters. I do not think it possible to give the effect contended for to this argument, and to construe the word "tramway" in that part of s. 43 which regulates the terms of payment in a different manner from that which a consideration of the section itself suggests on account of the language employed in the two preceding sections. That language is certainly not very felicitous. Whether the undertaking is purchased or not, the powers of the promoters equally cease and determine; the purchase does not keep their statutory powers alive. The powers are possessed thereafter by the local authority by virtue of the statute, in precisely the same manner as they were acquired by the promoters. For these reasons I think the interlocutors appealed from should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs. A

LORD WATSON concurred.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—The facts of the case have been so fully stated by the Lord Chancellor that I need only refer to them at such length as may make my meaning plain. The direct question raised before your Lordships is whether the arbitrator was right in valuing the tramway at what it would cost to make, or whether he ought to have ascertained what it could have been let for to a tenant who could use it, and then have capitalised its annual value. B

The question depends upon the construction of s. 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870. The decision is of deep moment to all the tramway companies in Great Britain and involves interests of considerable magnitude. The section is not clear. In any view of the case it is a cumbrous and unfortunate piece of drafting, not plain or direct, and each side is confronted with difficulties in its interpretation. It is not surprising to find that among the judges before whom the case has come there have been wide differences of opinion, and, therefore, I have applied myself to the consideration of the case, with many doubts and misgivings as to the soundness of my own judgment on important points, where, though I might be supported by the opinions of judges of eminence, I know my conclusions have been opposed to authorities for whom I entertain the very highest respect. The clause requires the closest and most critical examination and analysis in order to see what is the method of the transfer, what is sold, and what is to be paid. Nothing would have been easier than to have said that at the end of the twenty-one years there could be a transfer of the undertaking, and in such an event the undertakers should be paid for the cost of materials in situ capable of being worked, less depreciation. But the legislature in its wisdom has used a long, complicated, and involved sentence, from which we have to spell out and infer such meaning as we can. C

The transaction is to take place by a sale. A sale involves a selling and a buying, a bargaining, and here an arbitration. If what was meant was a statutable transfer at a statutable price, it was certainly not felicitous drafting to enact that the transaction should be carried out by the machinery set out at such length in the section. But a far more important consideration in the matter is what is sold and transferred under the section. The undertaking, of course, is sold, but the great difficulty is to give the due and proper meaning to the word "tramway." Is it only the tramway in situ, or the tramway with the power to use it? This is really a governing point in the case. Does the sale of the tramway include, or involve, or carry with it the right to use it? The words of the section are: D

"... when any such sale has been made, all the rights, powers, and authorities of [the company] in respect of the undertaking sold... shall"

vest in the purchaser. The words here, again, are not the best or the clearest. They must be read not only with the rest of the section, but also in connection with other sections, in order to see whether the right to the tramway is treated in the Act as carrying with it the right to use the tramway. E

Section 41 deals with the discontinuance of tramways, and enacts that in certain cases the Board of Trade may, by order, declare that from the date of the order the powers of the promoters shall be at an end, F

"and thereupon the said powers of the promoters shall cease and determine, unless the same are purchased by the local authority in manner by this Act provided," G i.e., by s. 43. Thus s. 41 expressly states that the powers, including the right to use, are purchased under s. 43. Section 42 is to the like effect. It deals with the insolvency of promoters, and provides for the ceasing of their powers "unless H

A the same are purchased by the local authority in manner by this Act provided, i.e., again by s. 43. In this connection it is important to note s. 44, which enacts:

B “Where any tramway in any district has been opened for traffic for a period of six months the promoters may, with the consent of the Board of Trade, sell their undertaking to any person, persons, corporation, or company, or to the local authority of such district; and when any such sale has been made all the rights, powers, authorities, obligations, and liabilities of such promoters in respect to the undertaking sold shall be transferred to, vested in, and may be exercised by, and shall attach to the person, corporation, company, or local authority to whom the same has been sold, in like manner as if such tramway was constructed by such person, corporation, company, or local authority under the powers conferred upon them by special Act, and in reference to the same they shall be deemed to be the promoters.”

C In my opinion, a sale under s. 44 would carry with it the right to use the tramway. Similar words are used in s. 43. The machinery of sale is resorted to, “the rights, powers, and authorities” are also transferred, and I cannot resist the conclusion that under both sections the buyer was intended to purchase and acquire with the tramway the right to use it. It was argued before your Lordships that the powers were to be regarded as the creatures of the statute, given independently by its provisions to “the promoters,” and that the sale had nothing to say to them, and did not carry, affect, or transfer them. I do not find any such idea in the judgments of the Court of Appeal in London Street Tramways Co. v. London County Council (1). LINDLEY, L.J., says ([1894] 2 Q.B. at p. 205):

F “The vendors have only a right of user, that is by s. 20; they have no land to sell, they have only an easement so far as the land is concerned, but they have an exclusive right to use the tramway by s. 29, and to grant licences to other persons to use it by s. 37. These rights will be enjoyed by the purchasers, and these rights must be borne in mind in ascertaining the value of the tramway. These rights exclude any valuation of the tramway as so much old iron to be broken up and removed. The tramway must be valued as an existing tramway, used as such by the vendors before the sale, and to be used as such by the purchasers after the sale.”

G The words of A. L. SMITH, L.J., on this point are very strong and clear (ibid. at pp. 214, 215):

H “I cannot doubt that what is to be sold and bought is not merely the tramway in situ as a structure, but the undertaking of the company as a going toll-earning concern—that is to say, the tramway as then in use, with the rights, powers, and authorities of the company to maintain it in the public streets, run cars thereon with flange wheels to the exclusion of all others, to take the prescribed tolls for so doing, and to exercise the other powers contained in the Act. Of this I have no doubt. The words of the section are clear—‘and thereupon the company shall sell,’ not their rails and sleepers, but ‘their undertaking,’ and when such sale has been made, ‘all the rights, powers, and authorities of the company in respect to the undertaking are to vest in the county council.’”

I A. L. SMITH, L.J., in the clearest words gave his opinion (ibid. at p. 215) that the company had to sell

“the powers granted to the company of running cars with flange wheels thereon to the exclusion of all others, and of taking the prescribed tolls and the other powers in the Act mentioned,” and he adds emphatically, “that this is what is to be sold by the company to the London County Council I do not doubt.” I concur in this view of A. L. SMITH,

L.J., which I regard as of the highest importance as stating and explaining the great value of the subject-matter to be sold. It may be that the language of the section is involved and roundabout, that the conveyancing is defective, but, to my mind, it is much more in accordance with the language of all the sections of the Act to hold the conclusion I have indicated than to spell out a narrower one in contradiction of what I believe to be the meaning of s. 43 itself, as well as to the clear words of ss. 41 and 42, and the construction required to give effect to s. 44.

If, then, the undertaking sold comprised or included a tramway capable of being used and with a right to use it, the next great question is: What is the price to be paid for it under the section? The section answers (leaving out the parenthesis for the present), "the then value of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant." The actual tramway, in a very literal sense, consists of little else except its iron rails. "The then value of the tramway" from the old-iron point of view would be a ludicrous mockery, and accordingly everyone—judges and arbitrators alike—repudiate any such construction and admit that a wider interpretation must be sought. A. L. SMITH, L.J., says (ibid. at p. 219):

"There can be no doubt that in any ordinary case, where an undertaking, such as the present, is to be sold and paid for, its present, that is, its then value, is in practice arrived at by capitalising its rental value."

MATHEW, J., more in detail, says (ibid. at p. 194):

"'Value' is to be ascertained as it would have to be ascertained for rating purposes, and that the word must be construed in that sense. These tramways are hereditaments, capable of earning profits, and assessable under the Poor Law Acts. That is clear from Pimlico Tramway Co. v. Greenwich Union (2), which has been called to our attention, and the meaning of which I have indicated of the word 'value' is recognised in many statutes in pari materia, as for instance, in the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, s. 4, and also in the Union Assessment Acts. To get at the value you take the profits, deduct the tenants' charges and reasonable profits, and what is left is the rent which would be paid by a tenant for the opportunity of earning his profit. By capitalising that rental you get at the value of the hereditament."

I, therefore, take it that apart from the parenthesis "the then value" would be held to have its ordinary meaning, as stated by A. L. SMITH, L.J. The onus of proving that the ordinary meaning should not be given to the words "the then value" is cast upon those who deny it, and the respondents insist that for this purpose they are entitled to rely upon the parenthesis, which says,

"exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale or other considerations whatsoever."

Prima facie, these words imply that, but for their use, the thing excluded would have been included. An exception, a parenthesis, an exclusion, under ordinary circumstances, would be held to qualify and lessen the generality of preceding words. Here, according to the contention, they are used not to abate but to destroy and contradict the ordinary meaning of the words "the then value." If the argument is correct that the value of the tramway is only the value of the materials in situ, profits would not need to be excluded, because not comprised in the original subject-matter. It is admitted that "the then value" is not to be found in the value of old iron; it is admitted that something very much more is to be assessed. Where is the line to be drawn? A. L. SMITH, L.J., well puts the question: "Are the words of exclusion in this section so strong, when applied to the things to be paid for—namely, a tramway in situ—as to exclude the ordinary way of ascertaining present value?" It must be borne in mind that the county council can only acquire ownership rights under the sale. They can let, but

A cannot themselves use, occupy, or work the tramway. They are debarred from making occupiers' profits, and, therefore, it is most reasonable to provide that no allowance should be made for them in the sale. It is most fair that in a sale to a public authority "the then value" should not be run up by the history of "past" or the anticipation of "future" profits. These words "past" or "future" are suggested by the word "then." The provision is that no "allowance" is to be made, and that is very far from an enactment that "the then value" may not be ascertained according to the ordinary rule and practice in like cases.

The argument of the respondents concentrates attention exclusively upon the parenthesis, and ignores and belittles everything in the section which would explain its terms. The Lord President in his judgment well says (21 R. (Ct. of Sess.) at p. 703):

C "The contention of the corporation seems to me exposed to the grave objection that it allows words having a subordinate and qualifying position to kill the plain import of the main proposition to which they relate, and does so by ascribing to those words more meaning than prima facie they bear. I cannot conceive why the legislature should describe the transaction as a sale, and say the terms are to be the payment of the existing value of the tramway, and then incidentally and by way of exclusion put in words which make the terms inconsistent with sale and purchase, and inconsistent also with payment of existing value."

It must be remembered that "the then value" of lands and buildings has also to be measured under the same section, and it would be almost impossible to ascertain the value of land and buildings without considering what rent a tenant would pay for them. The land and buildings may have cost large sums, and no one could suggest the reasonableness of giving less than their fair value under this provision. No "allowance" is here to be made for "past or future profits," but "the then value" is to be arrived at by the ordinary methods. It is also not to be forgotten that under this section a tramway company might be compelled to sell the most paying and successful part of its undertaking, retaining only the part which barely, if at all, paid its expenses. Under this section, admittedly, they could get no compensation for compulsory sale, or for severance.

The company concede that they, under its terms, are debarred from "any allowance" for their profits in "the past" or their hope of greater profit in "the future"; but could it have been intended that in providing that they were to get "the then value" they were to get less than would come to them under the ordinary rule, and be subjected to an arbitrary standard discovered by the arbitrator? Stockton and Middlesbrough Water Board v. Kirkleatham Local Board (3) is important as showing, to quote HENN COLLINS, J., when the London case was in the Divisional Court,

H "the words which the legislature uses when it does intend that the thing sold and the thing paid for shall be the materials, and not the right to use the materials."

The section in the present case is framed in an entirely different manner, because, in my opinion, the legislature contemplated a different operation with different results. No question of hardship can be considered. The construction of this section is all that is before your Lordships. I venture to think that the construction suggested by the county council is unreasonable, and that it would be natural to expect that if the legislature contemplated such a meaning they would have said so in plain language. The weighty words of MATHEW, J., in the Divisional Court, are worthy of attention ([1894] 2 Q.B. at pp. 196, 197):

I "The Act was intended to inform such of the public as were disposed to become shareholders in this kind of undertaking, and one would expect plain language addressed to such persons and their advisers as to what the legislature meant. If it meant to inform the public, 'You shall not have, at the end of twenty-one years, compensation for the value of the undertaking, but your undertaking shall be sold for the cost of the materials in situ, less depreciation,' I cannot help thinking that very few tramways would have been constructed, because a shareholder proposing to take shares has to satisfy himself that the profits of the undertaking would not only pay him interest upon his investment, but would restore to him wholly or partially, at the end of twenty-one years, his capital."

I have already intimated the doubts which I must entertain of the soundness of my views when I recognise the high authority of those who have reached a different conclusion, but, with all deference and submission, in my opinion the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

A Motion on behalf of the Crown asking that the defendant, a coroner, be ordered to deposit in court certain articles claimed to be treasure trove belonging to the Crown, or that he might be restrained by injunction from parting with the articles otherwise than to the Treasury Commissioners.

On Dec. 16, 1891, certain articles of ancient church plate, comprising three silver cups, a silver chalice, a silver pateen, and two silver pyxes, were found B hidden in the ground at Stoke Prior in Herefordshire. Shortly after their discovery they were taken possession of by the defendant, who was the coroner of the Leominster district of the county, who, on Oct. 12, 1892, proceeded to hold an inquest upon them. The jury before whom the question came found that the articles were treasure trove. Upon the coroner asking whether there were any claimants, it was urged on behalf of the Crown that a question of title as against C the Crown could not be decided upon an inquest, and that the coroner had no further duties to discharge, and the coroner was requested to discharge the jury and hand over the treasure to the Crown. The objection was overruled by the coroner, who thereupon proceeded to hear evidence in support of the claim of the lord of the manor to the articles, and to consider questions arising on the construction of several ancient deeds and documents. The jury were unable to agree upon D the question of ownership, and counsel for the Crown then asked that the jury should sign the inquest and verdict, and that the coroner should enter upon the inquest such verdict of the jury, and hand over the treasure to the Crown. These applications were all rejected by the coroner, who decided that the inquest was not complete until the jury had given a verdict on all the points put to them. He then bound the jury over to attend the Hereford Assizes for the direction of the E judge.

On the matter coming before DAY, J., it was found that one of the jury was absent owing to illness, and his Lordship thereupon discharged the jury. On behalf of the Crown, an application was made to DAY, J., that the coroner might record the verdict of "treasure trove" upon the inquisition. DAY, J., held that the inquiry was not yet complete, and that, whether or not he had jurisdiction to F compel the coroner to do one thing or another, in his opinion the coroner's proceedings had been throughout quite justified. The finding of treasure trove did not conclude the inquiry. The coroner was a very ancient and most responsible officer of the Crown, and he had to inquire amongst other things into the dues of the Crown, and as to the falling in of the rights of the Crown. The Crown was not absolutely entitled to treasure trove. The Crown was prima facie entitled to G it, but had in many instances parted with those rights to the subject. In those cases it could not seize the treasure trove, and the coroner was bound to inquire into the matter. The course adopted by the coroner had been the most convenient, because, if, without considering the claim made, the coroner had to hand the treasure over, the subject's only right would be the extremely precarious one of presenting a petition of right. DAY, J., accordingly refused the application on behalf of the Crown. Subsequently the coroner arranged to hold a fresh inquiry, H and upon receiving notice of such intention the Crown commenced the present action.

This was a motion on behalf of the Crown asking that the defendant might be ordered forthwith to deposit in court the articles in question, and claimed to be treasure trove belonging to Her Majesty, or otherwise that he might be restrained I by injunction until the trial of the action or further order from delivering, parting with, or in any manner disposing of the articles aforesaid to any person or persons otherwise than the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury.

STIRLING, J.—Having regard to the turn the matter has taken, it is not necessary for me to make a formal order; but I will say a few words in order to explain the grounds upon which I proceed. This action is brought by the Attorney-General against the coroner for the Loominster division of the county of Hereford, and the circumstances are somewhat peculiar. It appears that the articles mentioned in the notice of motion were found concealed in the earth, that the finders took them to the coroner, and that the coroner now has them in his possession. An inquest has been held, but the proceedings have proved abortive. There appears to have been no question that the articles were treasure trove. The jury, as I understand, were willing so to find, but the coroner desired that the inquiry should be prosecuted further, and that the title to those articles should be found by the jury. The jury were unable to agree. The matter was, in pursuance of the Coroners Act, 1887, adjourned to the assizes. It came before DAY, J., who discharged the jury. Therefore there has been no finding as yet in the matter, and it is proposed by the coroner to hold a further inquest. With that I am not asked to interfere, and I conceive it to be no part of my duty to interfere. But, having regard to certain observations which are reported to have been made by the learned judge, I desire to refer to one or two of the authorities on the subject.

First of all, I will refer to CHITTY on the PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN, where, at p. 152, "treasure trove" is thus defined :

"Treasure trove is where any gold or silver in coin, plate, or bullion is found concealed in a house, or in the earth, or other private place, the owner thereof being unknown, in which case the treasure belongs to the King or his grantee, having the franchise of treasure trove; but if he that laid it be known or afterwards discovered, the owner and not the King is entitled to it; this prerogative right only applying in the absence of an owner to claim the property.

There is no question, at the present moment, that a prima facie case of treasure trove has been made out. Prima facie, the title to treasure is in the Crown, but no doubt that title will be displaced by producing a grant to a subject of the franchise of treasure trove. But the question between the Crown and the subject must be decided by an interpretation of the grant, and I cannot conceive that it is possible that that title can be decided either by the coroner or by the verdict of the coroner's jury. It does not seem to me that it is a matter which falls within the jurisdiction of the coroner in cases of this kind to determine that title under s. 36 of the Act of 1887. That section says :

"A coroner shall continue as heretofore to have jurisdiction to inquire of treasure that is found, who were the finders, and who is suspected thereof."

The jurisdiction of the coroner is, therefore, limited to an inquiry who were the finders, and who is suspected thereof. I do not see, as at present advised, that he has any jurisdiction to determine the title. No doubt he may have incidentally to refer to the title, as was done in the case in which the verdict is set out on p. 536 of UMFREVILLE on the OFFICE AND DUTY OF CORONERS; but I think it is not according to law, that the title can be determined by the coroner.

That being so, I further think that, according to the authorities, the title of the Crown is independent of the finding of the jury. At p. 259 of CHITTY on the PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN the law is stated thus :

"As to personalty, the general rule seems to be, that the King is entitled without office or other matter of record; as in the case of goods and choses in action of felons, wreck of the sea, treasure trove, or the profits of lands of clerks, etc., convicted of felony, or of persons outlawed, in a personal action"; and the learned author goes on to cite the following passage from BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES (3 Bl. Com. at p. 259), which is to this effect :

"The inquests of office still remain in force, and are taken upon proper occasions; being extended not only to lands, but also to goods and chattels personal, as in the case of wreck, treasure trove, and the like, and especially

- A as to forfeitures for offences. For every jury which tries a man for treason or felony, every coroner's inquest that sits upon a felo de se, or one killed by chance-medley, is not only with regard to chattels, but also as to real interests, in all respects an inquest of office; and if they find the treason or felony, or even the flight of the party accused (though innocent), the King is thereupon by virtue of this office found entitled to have his forfeitures; and also in the
- B case of chance-medley, he or his grantees are entitled to such things by way of deodand as have moved to the death of the party."

I understand the meaning to be that, although it may be proper that an inquest should be held for the purpose of informing the Crown as to its rights, yet the finding of the jury is not essential to the title of the Crown to chattels.

- C That view appears to me to be borne out by a case in Ireland to which I have been referred—R. v. Toole (1)—in which the conclusion was arrived at, after a careful examination of all the old cases, that, in an indictment for concealing treasure trove, it is not necessary to state any inquisition before the coroner or office found as to the title of the Queen. That being so, the Crown is entitled to come here and to have its title determined, and, as it would seem to me, most conveniently determined, in an action of this sort in which questions arise as to
- D the construction of ancient Crown grants and other matters which cannot be properly gone into at the coroner's inquest. I think, therefore, the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, is fully entitled to come here, and to have the articles, the title to which is in question, secured until the dispute which has arisen is settled. For that purpose it seems to me that the lord of the manor ought to be made a party, and the learned Solicitor-General is willing that he should be let
- E in, and that the writ should be treated as amended at once, so that he would be made a defendant immediately. He appears on this occasion by counsel. The learned counsel for the coroner has asked me that he may not be deprived of the articles until after the inquest which he proposes to hold. I think that is reasonable; but he is willing to give an undertaking not to part with them until the further order of the court. I am willing to accept that undertaking. That is all
- F that is necessary to dispose of this motion on the present occasion. The motion, therefore, will stand over generally, but when the coroner has performed his duty and held the inquest, I suggest that the most convenient course would be that he should make an application to the court, when the question of costs can be considered. There will be no undertaking in damages.

The plaintiff sold malting barley to the defendant by sample and later forwarded the bulk by railway to his local station. On the day on which he bought the barley the defendant re-sold it by the same sample to a firm of brewers and maltsters. Three days later the plaintiff sold some inferior barley to the defendant, and, by accident, this inferior barley was mixed with the barley previously sold by sample to the defendant. The defendant obtained a bulk sample of this mixed barley from the station-master at his local station to which it had been sent, and then directed that the bulk be forwarded to the brewers who rejected it as not being up to the original sample. The defendant thereupon rejected it to the plaintiff. In an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the value of the barley,

Held: as the place for inspection of the barley was the place of delivery, i.e., the defendant's local railway station, the defendant took possession of it there; the property in it passed to him there; and, therefore, he no longer had a right of rejection when he forwarded it to the brewers, and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

Notes. Section 34 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (22 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) (1006) provides): "(1) Where goods are delivered to the buyer, which he has not previously examined, he is not deemed to have accepted them unless and until he has had a reasonable opportunity of examining them for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are in conformity with the contract. (2) Unless otherwise agreed, when the seller tenders delivery of goods to the buyer, he is bound, on request, to afford the buyer a reasonable opportunity of examining the goods for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are in conformity with the contract." By s. 15 (2) of that Act there are three implied conditions in a sale by sample. They are that the bulk shall correspond with the sample in quality, that the buyer shall have a reasonable opportunity of comparing bulk with the sample, and that the goods shall be free from any defect rendering them unmerchantable which would not be apparent on reasonable examination of the sample.

B Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of LAWRENCE, J., in favour of the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the value of goods rejected as inferior to sample.

C On Oct. 4, 1890, the plaintiff, who was a farmer, sold to the defendant, who was a corn dealer, at his stand in Leicester market, by sample, thirty-one quarters of malting barley at 34s. a quarter, to be delivered in sacks at Theddingworth Station, about two and a half miles from the plaintiff's farm. At the time of the sale the plaintiff was aware that the defendant would re-sell the barley, and probably to brewers or maltsters, but had no knowledge when or to whom such re-sales would take place nor to where the defendant would consign the barley. As a matter of fact, as it turned out, the defendant on the same day re-sold the barley by the same sample to Messrs. Sharpe & Co., brewers and maltsters, at Sileby, at an advance of 2s. per quarter. On Oct. 7 the plaintiff sold to the defendant in Market Harborough market three more quarters of barley of not such good quality as the first; and it was arranged that the plaintiff should send to the defendant a sample of this barley, the price to be thereafter agreed upon. This barley was also to be delivered by the plaintiffs in sacks at Theddingworth Station. Upon the plaintiff's arriving home at his farm in the evening he found that his men, whilst winning the three quarters, had, against his orders, mixed them with the thirty-one quarters, and he at once wrote to the defendant informing him of what had been done, and adding that if the defendant complained that it made any difference to him in the sample he (the plaintiff) would make it good; but he hoped that it would not. Upon receipt of this letter the defendant, on Oct. 8, wrote to the station-master at Theddingworth station to forward him a sample of the "about thirty-five quarters of barley ex A. K. Perkins." This the station-master did, taking the sample out of twenty of the thirty-four quarters which had then arrived at his station. The residue arrived there the next day. It was admitted that the station-master took a fair sample of the barley.

G Having inspected this sample the defendant, on Oct. 9, ordered the station-master to forward the thirty-four quarters (called forty) to the order of Messrs. Sharpe & Co., maltsters, Silcby, at Sileby station, stating that the cost of carriage was to be placed to his account. The barley was sent off on Oct. 10. On Oct. 16 Messrs. Sharpe & Co., by telegraph to the defendant, rejected the barley, which was then at Sileby, and the defendant thereupon wrote to Messrs. Sharpe & Co. as follows:

"Oct. 16, 1890.—Your telegram to hand. I can only say we had a bulk sample from sending station before moving on, and considered it a fair delivery. However, will you bring large bulk sample on Saturday to Leicester market, and oblige? The barley left sending station on the 10th inst., according to my back rate.—Yours truly, William Ball, jun."

I On the same day, before the receipt of the above-mentioned letter, Messrs. Sharpe & Co. wrote to the defendant stating:

"It seems strange that you did not take a bulk sample of it yourself before ordering on to Sileby, and thus save carriage. We feel sure if you had done so, as promised, you would not have sent it, as it is quite unfit for the brewing of ale."

The barley was subsequently rejected by the defendant, and hence the present action.

On Mar. 16, 1892, the action came on for trial at the Leicester Winter Assizes before LAWRENCE, J., sitting without a jury. It was, however, adjourned to London for further consideration, and came on on May 26, 1892. The learned judge decided in favour of the defendant on the ground that the first opportunity the defendant had of such a complete and full inspection as he was entitled to have under a contract of the kind was when delivery took place at the brewers' station. The plaintiff appealed.

Dec. 17, 1892.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court.—This is an action for goods sold and delivered, and the point raised is whether, under the contract and the circumstances existing in this case, the defendant was entitled to reject the goods purchased and throw them upon the plaintiff's hands; or, in other words, whether the property in the goods had passed to the defendant before he sought to reject them.

The case is of some importance, as it arises out of a contract of common occurrence between farmers and middlemen. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The sole point the parties raise is whether upon the contract between them, and the facts of this case, the defendant was in time in rejecting the barley as and when he did. My brother LAWRENCE held that he was; and hence the present appeal. It will be noticed that by the contract the plaintiff was to deliver the barley at Theddingworth station. No other destination was known to him, and we cannot doubt that if this had been a sale of specific ascertained barley, the property therein would have passed to the defendant upon its delivery to the railway company at the station by the plaintiff. The railway company would thereupon have become the agents of the defendant to receive it and to carry it to any place or places the defendant might direct.

But it was said by counsel for the defendant that inasmuch as this was a sale by sample, the defendant was entitled to a fair opportunity of comparing the bulk with the sale sample after delivery, before the property in the barley passed to him, and that the place for inspection need not necessarily be the place at which delivery is to be made; and in this we agree. The question, however, is if there can be read into this contract an implied term that inspection was to be had at any place fixed by the vendee without the knowledge of the vendor. This is not a case in which upon a sale by sample it is agreed that the destination of the goods shall be the vendee's premises or some other named locality, and that the transit thereto shall be performed partly by the vendor and partly by the vendee. In such a case it would be right to imply that the place of destination agreed upon was the place for inspection, and that the joint transit was only an agreed mode of getting the goods there: see Grimoldby v. Wells (1). This is a case in which at the time of sale the only known destination was Theddingworth station, at which the vendor undertook to deliver the barley at his own risk and expense. Of all that should take place afterwards as regards the barley, the vendor knew nothing. It was entirely at the disposal of the vendee, who might send it where and to whom he pleased, and when he pleased, and over which disposition the seller could exercise no control.

We find no evidence in this case to dislodge the presumption which prima facie arises, that the place of delivery is the place for inspection. To hold otherwise would be to expose the vendor to unknown risks, impossible of calculation, when the contract was entered into. The vendee might consign the barley not only to one, but to different sub-vendees, living in different places and at different distances from Theddingworth station, and until arrival at those places the barley would be at the risk of the vendor. If the barley was rejected by these sub-vendees upon arrival, then the vendor would have at his own risk and cost to

A take the barley back from whatever place or places it might happen to be, no matter how far they might be from Theddingworth station, or to arrange for its sale at the places where it then was. As to these risks the contract is wholly silent, and in our judgment it is impossible to read into it that the vendor undertook these risks, as we were invited by counsel for the defendant to do.

B It was argued that Theddingworth station was a mere road-side station, and that there was no opportunity there of comparing the bulk with the sample, and that consequently the station was not the place for inspection and that some other place was, and that this was the warehouse of the maltsters or brewers to whom the defendant might have chanced to have sent the barley. The evidence given shows that the bulb could be inspected in the sacks in the trucks at the station. The suggestion that the barley had to be shot, before inspection, is untenable, C and there is no evidence to support it. Moreover, the letters of Oct. 16 show that neither the defendant nor Messrs. Sharpe considered that there was any difficulty whatever in taking a bulk sample at the station; the one saying that he had had one taken, and the other saying that he should have done so, as promised. It seems to us that even if the plaintiff's country solicitors did take a wrong view of their client's position under the contract, as suggested by counsel for the defendant, this cannot affect its construction. And as there is nothing in the contract D itself, nor any evidence, to show that by usage of trade as applied to such a contract, or otherwise, the prima facie place for inspection had been altered, in our judgment, under the contract the place of delivery named was the place where the inspection was to be had, and that consequently Theddingworth station was the place where rejection should have taken place, and not the premises of the maltsters at Sileby. When the defendant took possession of the barley at the E station and ordered it to his sub-vendees, the property in the barley passed to him, and his right of rejection was then gone. For these reasons we think the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. LAWRENCE, J., does not appear to have had his mind sufficiently directed to the real nature of the contract between the parties. The appeal must be allowed with costs here and below, and judgment entered for the F plaintiff for £52 14s.

Re WALKER. SHEFFIELD BANKING CO. v. CLAYTON

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Stirling, J.), November 3, 1891, January 14, 1892]

Guarantee—Surety—Collateral security given by principal debtor to surety—Right of principal creditor to security.

A testator gave guarantees to a bank to secure the overdraft of two partners, and, to secure him against liability on these guarantees, the wife of one of the partners gave him two equitable mortgages. The partnership firm went into liquidation. The testator died, his affairs were administered by the court, and the estate was found to be insolvent. It was, accordingly, unable to make good the amount due under the guarantees, and the bank claimed to be entitled to the benefit of the equitable mortgages.

Held: a surety who took from the principal debtor a bond or indemnity did not become a trustee of that security for the principal creditor, and, therefore, the claim of the bank could not be maintained.

Further Consideration in an action for the administration of the real and personal estate of the testator Hugh Walker.

The testator in the year 1886 gave to the London and Yorkshire Bank two guarantees for the sum of £1,000 each to secure the overdraft of Arthur Spencer and Reuben Spencer trading as Spencer Brothers. At the same time Agnes Spencer, the wife of Arthur Spencer, gave to the testator as security for anything he might be called upon to pay under the guarantees, two equitable mortgages created by memoranda of deposit of title deeds. The memoranda were dated respectively July 5 and Aug. 18, 1886. Subsequently to these transactions Spencer Brothers transferred their account from the London and Yorkshire Bank to the Sheffield Banking Co. On Sept. 9, 1887, the testator gave to the Sheffield Banking Co. a guarantee to secure the repayment of all moneys then owing, or which might become owing to them by Spencer Brothers either on their current account or on any other account to the extent of £2,000. In May, 1889, Spencer Brothers went into liquidation.

The testator died on Nov. 4, 1888, leaving a will by which he appointed the defendants his executors. The will was proved by the defendants on Jan. 24, 1889. The plaintiff company then commenced a creditor's action for the adminis-

A tration of the testator's estate. An administration judgment was given in that action on April 25, 1890. The testator's estate was insufficient for payment of debts, including the liability of the testator under the guarantee given to the plaintiff company.

The plaintiff company now claimed to be entitled to the benefit of the equitable mortgages given to the testator by Agnes Spencer. The defendants, on the other B hand, contended that the plaintiffs were not so entitled, but could only rank as creditors pari passu with the other creditors of the estate.

C Jan. 14, 1892. STIRLING, J., read the following judgment of the court in which he stated the facts and continued.—The plaintiffs' contention was founded upon two cases. The first is an old case of Maure v. Harrison (1). It is reported very shortly as follows (1 Eq. Cas. Abr. at p. 93):

D "A bond creditor shall in [the Court of Chancery] have the benefit of all counter-bonds or collateral security given by the principal to the surety; as if A. owes B. money, and he and C. are bound for it, and A. gives C. a mortgage or bond to indemnify him, B. shall have the benefit of it to recover his debt."

That case was decided in Michaelmas, 1692. The plaintiffs also relied upon a dictum of SIR WILLIAM GRANT in Wright v. Morley (2) which runs thus (11 Ves. E at p. 22):

"I conceive that, as the creditor is entitled to the benefit of all the securities the principal debtor has given to his surety, the surety has fully as good an equity to the benefit of all the securities the principal gives to the creditor."

F As to the latter portion of the sentence, there is no question at all. It is well established at this date that the surety, on paying the debt, is entitled to stand in the place of the principal creditor, and to have the benefit of all the securities which the principal creditor had.

These two cases were very much discussed in the well-known case of Ex parte Waring (3), before LORD ELDON. That case is most fully reported perhaps in GLYN AND JAMESON'S REPORTS. It appears from that report that, in the course C of the argument, LORD ELDON spoke somewhat disparagingly of Maure v. Harrison (1). He said this (2 Gl. & J. at p. 411):

"I have never heard this case relied upon as a governing case at this day"

In the judgment as reported in 19 VESY, he puts it thus (19 Ves. at p. 348):

H "The prayer of the first of these petitions has been supported upon this ground, that the short bills and the mortgage...having been placed with Brickwood & Co. as a security against their acceptances, the holders of those bills have an equity to have that security applied specifically to the discharge of those acceptances upon the general ground that, upon a transaction of this kind, a person holding the bills which are the subject of indemnity has a right to the benefit of the contract between the principal debtor and the party I indemnified, and though not himself a party to that contract, to say that he, who has contracted for the payment of certain debts out of those pledges, is liable in equity to the demand upon the part of those whose demands are to be so paid for that application, and a case was cited [Maure v. Harrison (1)] which goes that length. With regard to that case, or cases in general, I desire it to be understood that I forbear to give any opinion upon that point."

Then he goes on to say that he decides not on Ex parte Waring (3) but on another ground.

The result of these two cases, namely, the dictum of SIR WILLIAM GRANT in Wright v. Morley (2) and the judgment and observations of LORD ELDON in Ex parte Waring (3), seems to me to be that SIR WILLIAM GRANT and LORD ELDON were not of the same mind on the point. Under these circumstances I was very anxious to discover what was really done in Maure v. Harrison (1), which is so shortly reported in ABRIDGEMENT OF CASES IN EQUITY. The registrar has been kind enough to make search for that case. No decree was drawn up, but the entry of the case has been found in the registrar's book, and the pleadings have been discovered, and I am indebted to the learned reporter of this court, Mr. Knox, for having made a summary of them for my use, the pleadings themselves being somewhat lengthy. From them and the notes in the registrar's book it is tolerably easy to discover what the case was.

The plaintiff was Thomas Maure, the defendants were William Harrison and William Morley and Mary his wife. Thomas Maure was the father of the first wife of William Harrison, the father of William Harrison the defendant. By that first marriage William Harrison the father had three children, viz., William, the defendant, Thomas, and Margaret. The first wife having died, William Harrison, the father, married his second wife Mary, the defendant, then the wife of William Maure, and afterwards he died intestate leaving this widow and three children by the first wife the persons entitled to his personal estate under the Statute of Distribution. Administration was taken out by his widow, and the shares of the three children in the intestate's property amounted to £120. It appears that the plaintiff, Thomas Maure, the grandfather of William Harrison the defendant, was very anxious that William Harrison, his grandson, should continue the business of a farmer which had been carried on by William Harrison the father, but for that purpose it was necessary that the sum of £120 which formed the portion of the intestate's estate belonging to the three children should be paid over to William Harrison the son, and that was accordingly done.

The two other children being infants, Thomas Maure the father and the plaintiff in the action gave a bond to the defendant Mary Morley, the legal personal representative of the intestate, to indemnify her against all claims by those children. It appears that at this time William Harrison, the defendant, was an infant, but the money was paid to him. He attained twenty-one, and carried on the farm for some time. After attaining twenty-one he repudiated the transaction and began to press William Morley and Mary his wife for payment of his share of his father's estate, which he had already received in point of fact, though apparently an infant. Thereupon William Morley gave him a bond for payment of his share, and William Morley and Mary his wife began to sue the plaintiff Thomas Maure in the Court of Exchequer for payment under the bond which had been given by him. Thereupon the plaintiff instituted this suit in equity to restrain the action, and to obtain delivery up of the bond which had been given by him. Of the other children who were interested in the intestate's estate, Thomas had died an infant and intestate, and Margaret was still an infant, and was not a party to the suit. The argument is stated in the registrar's book. It is to be observed that the bill is by the person who gave the bond to be relieved of it, and the result is thus stated in the registrar's book:

"By the court; Do declare that the defendant William is well paid, and he must deliver up the bond to the other defendant."

That is the bond (as I read it) which has been given by William Morley to the defendant William Harrison for payment of his share. Whether that relief ought to have been inserted in the decree may be a question, because that would be relief between co-defendants. Then it goes on,

"stay all proceedings at law on the plaintiffs' £100 [that is a mistake for £120 as clearly appears from the previous passage in the registrar's note, where it is corrected in the margin] till Margaret doth release, and when the plaintiff

A hath procured Margaret, who is not a party to the action, to release that bond, then that bond to be delivered up . . . but then the plaintiff's bond to be at suit for the recovery of Margaret's moiety of £120."

So that all that was decided in that action was that the plaintiff, who had given his bond of indemnity, was not entitled to have it delivered up to be cancelled till all claims had been settled.

B Under these circumstances it appears that the point for which it was cited in ABRIDGEMENT OF CASES IN EQUITY could not have been decided in that case, and that at most the reported statement amounts to a dictum in the course of the argument. It is now nearly two hundred years since this case was decided, and the sole authorities on a point which must have been of frequent occurrence are a dictum in 1692, a dictum early in this century by SIR WILLIAM GRANT in the year 1805, and what appears to me to be the contrary opinion of LORD ELDON a little later.

C Under those circumstances it seems to me that there is no authority for the proposition in question. Upon principle I cannot see why a surety who takes from the principal debtor a bond or indemnity at once becomes a trustee of that for the principal creditor. That is really the contention of the plaintiffs. Of course the other doctrine is well established, viz., that the surety who pays the debt is entitled to stand in the place of the principal creditor; but this doctrine rests entirely on those dicta which I have mentioned. It seems to me that under these circumstances I cannot give effect to the contention of the plaintiffs, and that they must simply be left to prove against the estate of the testator for what is due, without having the exclusive benefit of these securities in respect of which payments have been made to the estate.

LAW v. REDDITCH LOCAL BOARD

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.), November 26, 1891]

[Reported [1892] 1 Q.B. 127; 61 L.J.Q.B. 172; 66 L.T. 76; 56 J.P. 292; 8 T.L.R. 90; 36 Sol. Jo. 90]

Contract—Breach—Damages—Liquidated damages or penalty—Agreed sum "as and for liquidated damages" payable on happening of one event.

When the parties to a contract have agreed that, in the case of one of them doing something or omitting to do something, he shall pay to the other a specified sum as damages, that specified sum is to be construed by the court to be liquidated damages and not a penalty.

By a contract for the building of some drainage works it was agreed that the works should "be completed in all respects, and cleared of all implements, tackle, impediments, and rubbish, on or before April 30." It was also agreed that in default of such completion the contractor should forfeit and pay the sum of £100, and £5 for every seven days during which the works should be incomplete after that date, and the sum so forfeited should be recovered by the defendants from the contractor "as and for liquidated damages."

Held: the agreed sum was payable on the happening of only one event, namely, the non-completion of the works by the specified date, and ought to be treated as liquidated damages and not as a penalty. A

Per LORD ESHER, M.R.: To the general rule one recognised exception is that if a large sum of money is to be paid in respect of the non-payment of a smaller specified sum, the court will treat it as a penalty. Another exception is that if the sum agreed to be paid is, with regard to the matter in reference to which it is to be paid, so large as to be an absurd amount if considered as liquidated damages, the court would declare that the sum to be paid was a penalty. There are also cases in which the parties to the contract have agreed to the payment by one of them of a certain fixed sum in respect of his failing to do one of several different things of varying degrees of importance. Such a sum is, as a general rule, to be treated in these cases as a penalty. B

Per LOPES, L.J.: The distinction between liquidated damages and a penalty depends on the intention of the parties, which is to be gathered from the whole contract. If their intention is to secure performance of the contract by the imposition of a fine or penalty, then the sum specified is a penalty; but if their intention is to assess the damages for breach of the contract, it is liquidated damages. Appeal from a decision of HAWKINS, J., at the trial without a jury at Birmingham Assizes. I

The plaintiff was a building contractor, and the action was brought by him for work done for the defendants under a contract for the building of some drainage works. The defendants paid £400 into court and counterclaimed for money due from the plaintiff to them under a clause in the contract for default in completion of the works by a certain day. By the contract it was agreed that for the consideration therein mentioned the plaintiff would duly execute all the works and

A things mentioned in the contract, and a specification annexed, thereafter called "the works," and it was provided that

"the works shall be completed in all respects, and cleared of all implements, tackle, impediments, and rubbish, on or before April 30, 1889, to the satisfaction of the said surveyor, to be testified by a certificate under his hand; and in default of such completion, the contractor shall forfeit and pay to the urban authority the sum of £100, and £5 for every seven days during which the works shall be incomplete after the said time, and the sums so forfeited may be recovered by the urban authority from the contractor as and for liquidated damages."

C There was also a clause providing that, in default of the due performance and execution of the terms of the contract by the contractor, he should pay to the urban authority the sum of £200 as and for liquidated damages for the breach of the contract, in addition to any other penalties, forfeitures, and damages to which he might be liable under the contract. The works were not completed for twelve weeks after April 30, 1889, and the defendants counterclaimed for £160, being the £100 and the weekly payment of £5 provided for by the contract in such a case.

D It was admitted that the damage suffered by the defendants by reason of this delay of twelve weeks was considerably less in fact than £160, and it was agreed what the damage was. The only question, therefore, for the court to determine was whether the sum of money fixed by the contract for the non-completion was to be treated as liquidated damages according to the proviso in the contract or as a penalty. HAWKINS, J., ruled that this sum ought to be treated as liquidated damages, and gave judgment accordingly for the defendants. The plaintiff

Jelf, Q.C., and Vachell for the plaintiff.

Hugo Young and R. Harrington, for the defendants, were not called upon to argue.

F LORD ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me unnecessary in this case to go again through all the cases that have been decided on this subject, and their various circumstances. There is one rule which all judges have always agreed about, and which is, therefore, a canon of construction in interpreting these agreements, and that rule is this: When the parties to a contract have agreed that, in case of one of them doing something or omitting to do something, he shall pay to the other a specified sum as damages, then in such a case that specified sum is to be construed by the court to be liquidated damages, and not a penalty. To that general rule one recognised exception is, that if a large sum of money is to be paid in respect of the non-payment of a smaller specified sum, the court will treat it as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages. I think, too, that there is another exception, namely, that if the sum agreed to be paid is, with regard to the matter

G in reference to which it is to be paid, so large as to be an absurd amount if considered as liquidated damages, then the court would hold that the parties to the contract could not have intended such an absurdity, and it would declare that the sum to be paid was a penalty, and not liquidated damages. There are also cases in which the parties to the contract have agreed to the payment by one of them of a certain fixed sum of money in respect of his failing to do one of several

H different things of different degrees of importance. Such a sum is, as a general rule, to be treated in these cases as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages; but as to that there are many matters which may have to be considered hereafter, which I think we need not trouble ourselves about today.

I If the sums of £100 and £5 a week are payable under this contract which we now have to consider in respect of the non-performance of only one thing, if there is only one event in respect of which they are payable, then the case comes within the rule which has been followed in all the cases from the time of HEATH, J., in Astley v. Weldon (1) down to LORD HERSCHELL in Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland

Iron and Coal Co. (2), and that sum is to be treated not as a penalty, but as liquidated damages. This contract we have now to consider is to be construed according to that canon of construction. Therefore, if there is under it only one event in respect of which these sums of £100 and £5 a week are to be paid, they are to be regarded, as liquidated damages and not as penalties. A

The contract is one for the construction of some drainage works, and it provides that B

“the works [meaning the drainage works] shall be completed in all respects, and cleared of all implements, tackle, impediments, and rubbish on or before April 30, 1889.”

That is to say, two things, viz., the completion of the works and the clearance of them, shall take place by that day. Then the sentence goes on, C

“and in default of such completion the contractor shall forfeit and pay to the urban authority the sum of £100 and £5 for every seven days during which the works shall be incomplete after the said time.”

The default for which the money is payable is default in completion only, and in such completion as was mentioned before, that is to say, completion of the works which in the earlier part of the sentence is referred to as something distinct from the clearance of them. It seems to me, therefore, that there is only one event upon which the contractor's liability to pay the £100 and the £5 a week depends, namely, the non-completion of the works by April 30, 1889. Then the sentence goes on, D

“and the sums so forfeited may be recovered by the urban authority from the contractor as and for liquidated damages.” E

I do not think that any reliance, or rather I should say, very little, ought to be placed on these last words, for even if the sums were called penalties the same considerations might be applicable; but they must not be left out of consideration altogether. They go somewhat to show that the parties intended that these sums should be liquidated damages and not penalties. If that be the true construction of the contract, then there is no multitudinous event comprised in the word completion, and the clearance of the works is not a thing in respect of default in which the agreed sums would become payable. F

It was suggested that the specification modifies the meaning of the words in the contract; but there again it is only the completion of the works that is mentioned, and the meaning of the words in the contract is not affected. I have said that, to my mind, the word “completion” in the contract applies only to the completion of the works, and not to their clearance, but if that be not so, the same result follows. Both completion and clearance are to have taken place by April 30, so that, if “completion” includes the two, the non-completion on April 30 in respect of which the sums become payable would be only one event. So that, applying the same canon of construction to that view of the contract, the money being payable on the non-happening of a single event on a particular day, we must come to the conclusion that this sum is liquidated damages, and not a penalty. Whatever questions may some day arise on the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Wallis v. Smith (3), no question on that case arises here now. The judgment of HAWKINS, J., must be affirmed, and this appeal will be dismissed. G

LOPES, L.J.—The question is whether the sums of £100 and £5 a week are a penalty or liquidated damages. In the contract they are called liquidated damages; but this cannot be relied on much because the use of this expression or of “penalties” by the parties to the contract is not conclusive. The distinction between the two depends on the intention of the parties, which is to be gathered from the whole contract. If their intention is to secure performance of the contract by the imposition of a fine or penalty, then the sum specified is a penalty; but if on the

A other hand their intention is to assess the damages for breach of the contract, it is liquidated damages. The Master of the Rolls has already referred to a canon of construction, according to which, if the specified sum is to be payable on the happening or non-happening of one event, not many, it is considered to be liquidated damages; but, if it is payable on the happening or non-happening of one of several events of unequal importance, then it is considered to be a penalty.

B Applying that rule to the present case, we must first construe the contract. It provides that,

“the works shall be completed in all respects and cleared of all implements, tackle, impediments, and rubbish on or before April 30, 1889.”

C Two things are here contemplated, the completion of the works and the clearing away of the rubbish, etc.; those are two separate things which have to be done. Then, “in default of such completion,” a sum of money becomes payable. That default refers, I think, only to the completion of the works which is mentioned at the beginning of the clause, and not to the clearance of them. According to this construction of the contract only one event is contemplated as being ground for the payment of the agreed sums, namely, the non-completion of the works on the day specified. Then, according to the canon of construction that has been referred to those sums are liquidated damages and not a penalty. Besides the

D clause I have read there is another clause in the contract which was referred to by counsel for the plaintiff, under which some money might be claimed as a penalty for failure to clear the works; but that clause does not affect the construction of the one which we have to construe, and it need not be considered any further.

E I will just refer shortly to the Scottish case in the House of Lords of Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co. (2). The head-note to the case contains this (11 App. Cas. at p. 332):

“When one lump sum is made payable by way of compensation on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damage, the presumption is that the parties intended the sum to be penal and subject to modification.”

F And LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in giving his opinion said (ibid. at p. 345):

“The agreement does not provide for the payment of a lump sum upon the non-performance of any one of many obligations differing in importance. It has reference to a single obligation, and the sum to be paid bears a strict proportion to the extent to which that obligation is left unfulfilled. There is nothing whatever to show that the compensation is ordinate or extravagant in relation to the damage sustained. And provision is made that the payment is to bear interest from the date when the obligation is unfulfilled. I know of no authority for holding that a payment agreed to be made under such conditions as these is to be regarded as a penalty only; and I see no sound reason or principle, or even convenience, for so holding.”

H This opinion is an authority which confirms the view we are taking on the construction of this contract.

KAY, L.J.—This contract contains the following words: [His LORDSHIP read the relevant clause of the contract and continued:] What is the meaning of those words? In very early times it was decided by courts of equity that, when a sum of money was agreed to be paid for a breach of a contract, the court would not allow this penalty to be exacted, but would assess the damages which had been actually caused by the breach that had occurred. The law began thus: LORD MACCLESFIELD in his judgment in Peachy v. The Duke of Somerset (4), in 1721, said (1 Stra. at p. 653) that

“the true ground of relief against penalties is from the original intent of the case where the penalty is designed only to secure money and the court gives him all that he expected or desired.”

This doctrine was afterwards extended to other cases than the security of money. In 1784 LORD THURLOW, in Sloman v. Walter (5), said (1 Bro.C.C. at pp. 418, 419):

"The rule that, where a penalty is inserted merely to secure the enjoyment of a collateral object, the enjoyment of the object is considered as the principal intent of the deed, and the penalty only as accessional, and therefore only to secure the damage really incurred, is too strongly established in equity to be shaken."

In that case the agreed sum was to secure the possession of a certain room, and LORD THURLOW regarding it as a penalty granted an injunction against a suit for its recovery. This rule was followed again and again, and it became settled law in equity that, when a sum of money was agreed to be paid upon the performance or non-performance of some collateral act in a contract, the actual damages arising from which could easily be estimated, the penalty would be cut down, and the actual damage suffered would be assessed. To avoid that law a custom grew up of inserting in contracts a clause settling what should be damages for the breach, and the amount agreed to be paid was to be paid "as and for liquidated damages." That was done to avoid the interference of courts of equity. But then the courts of law interfered and said that they would construe the sum that was agreed to be liquidated damages as a penalty.

A leading case on the subject is Astley v. Weldon (1) in which HEATH, J., said (2 Bos. & P. at p. 353):

"Where articles contain covenants for the performance of several things, and then one large sum is stated at the end to be paid upon breach of performance, that must be considered as a penalty. But where it is agreed that, if a party do such a particular thing, such a sum shall be paid by him, there the sum stated may be treated as liquidated damages."

And again, in Kemble v. Farren (6) the court seeing that the sum agreed to be payable as liquidated damages was to be paid on the performance or non-performance of several things which would have resulted in very different degrees of damage, treated this sum as only a penalty. The case, said TINDAL, C.J. (6 Bing. at p. 148), was

"precisely that in which courts of equity have always relieved, and against which courts of law have in modern times endeavoured to relieve, by directing juries to assess the real damages sustained by the breach of the agreement."

All the cases on this subject are very fully discussed by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Wallis v. Smith (3). It was no doubt a very serious interference with the terms of a contract to say that, though the parties to it had expressly stipulated that a sum was to be paid as liquidated damages, the court would refuse to allow it and would treat the sum as a penalty. It has never been done except in cases like Kemble v. Farren (6), where the sum of money has been made payable on the happening of any one of a number of events some of which must result in very inconsiderable damages.

In considering the case before us, we must construe the contract and see whether this agreed sum is made payable on the happening of only one event, or on the happening of one out of several events. As to that I agree with the judgment of HAWKINS, J., and with all that the Master of the Rolls has said. There is only one event, the non-completion of the works, upon the happening of which this money became payable; the failure to clear away the implements and rubbish is not a part of that event, the clearance is something which has to be done in addition to the completion, but the agreed sum is not payable upon its non-performance. But if the contract be read so as to make "completion" include the clearing away of the implements and rubbish, even then there will be only one event, non-completion by April 30, upon which the money is payable. I cannot agree with the argument that, because there are many matters, some very

A small, which would constitute non-completion, the agreed sums may be considered as becoming payable on the happening of several events. The causes may be many, but the actual non-completion by April 30, 1889, is a single event. I also agree that there is nothing in the specification which affects the construction of the clause in the contract which we have been considering. For these reasons I agree that the judgment of HAWKINS, J., was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

H., the owner of a public-house, sold it to the defendants, who retained him as their manager at a salary, his name being over the door and the licence continuing in his name. The plaintiff sold cigars to H. to be sold in the public-house in ignorance of the fact that he had been expressly forbidden by the defendants to purchase cigars on credit. Being unable to obtain payment from H., to whom alone he had given credit, the plaintiff, finding that H. was manager to the defendants, sued them.

Held: as the cigars were such as would usually be dealt in at such a house as the defendants', H. was acting within the scope of his implied authority as manager in ordering them, and the defendants could not as against the plaintiff set up any secret limitation of that authority.

Appeal from Middlesbrough County Court in an action brought to recover the price of certain cigars supplied by the plaintiff to the Victoria Hotel, Stockton-on-Tees.

The Victoria Hotel had been kept up to 1888 by one Humble, who in that year disposed of it to the defendants, but remained in the house as their manager at a salary. Humble's name remained over the door, and the licence continued to be held in his name. He was forbidden by the defendants to buy cigars on credit, but bought a quantity from the plaintiff, who gave credit to him alone for them, not knowing of the defendants. On finding out, however, that he was manager for the defendants, the plaintiff sued them, and the county court judge gave judgment in his favour. The defendants appealed.

Dec. 12, 1892.—LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., read the following judgment of WILLS, J., as the judgment of the court.—The plaintiff sues the defendants for the price of cigars supplied to the Victoria Hotel, Stockton-upon-Tees. The house was kept not by the defendants, but by a person named Humble. This person's name was over the door of the house. The plaintiff gave credit to him and to him alone, and had never heard of the defendants. The business, however, was really the defendants', and they had put Humble into it to manage it for them, and had forbidden him to buy cigars on credit. The cigars, however, were such as would usually be supplied to and dealt in at such an establishment. The learned county court judge held that the defendants were liable. I am of opinion that he was right.

There seems to be less of direct authority on the subject than one would expect. But I think the Lord Chief Justice during the argument laid down the correct principle, namely, once it is established that the defendant was the real principal, the ordinary doctrine as to principal and agent applies—that the principal is liable for all the acts of the agent which are within the authority usually confided to an agent of that character, notwithstanding limitations, as between the principal and the agent, put upon that authority. It is said that it is only so where there has been a holding out of authority, which cannot be said of a case where the person supplying the goods knew nothing of the existence of a principal. But I do not think so; otherwise in every case of undisclosed principal, or at least in every case where the fact of there being a principal was undisclosed, the secret limitation of authority would prevail, and defeat the action of the person dealing with the agent and then discovering that he was an agent and had a principal. But in the case of a dormant partner it is clear law that no limitation of authority as between the dormant partner and active partner will avail the dormant partner as to things within the ordinary authority of a partner. The law of partnership is, in such a question, nothing but a branch of the general law of principal and agent, and it appears to me to be undisputed and conclusive on the point now under discussion.

The principle laid down by the Lord Chief Justice and acted upon by the learned county court judge appears to be identical with that enunciated in the judgments of COCKBURN, C.J., and MELLOR, J., in Edmunds v. Bushell and Jones (1), the circumstances of which case, though not identical with those of the present case, come very near to them. There was no question of holding out, as the plaintiff knew nothing of the defendants. I appreciate the distinction drawn by counsel for the defendants in his argument, but the principle laid down by the judgment referred to, if correct, abundantly covers the present case. I cannot find that

A any doubt has ever been expressed that it is correct, and I think it is right, and that very mischievous consequences would result if the principle were not upheld. In my opinion, the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Non-compliance with bankruptcy notice—For what amount to be issued—Part payment of judgment debt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), s. 4.

E By s. 4 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [see now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (g)], a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy: "(g) If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him . . . a bankruptcy notice under this Act, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, or to secure or compound for it . . . and he does not . . . either comply with the requirements of the notice, or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim set-off or cross-demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained."

G A creditor who has obtained a final judgment against a debtor is not entitled to issue a bankruptcy notice for any larger amount than that for which he is entitled to issue execution. Therefore, a creditor who has been paid part of his judgment debt cannot issue a bankruptcy notice for the whole debt, but only for the balance remaining due after deducting any payments that have been made.

Appeal by the debtor from the refusal of the registrar of the Wandsworth County Court to set aside a bankruptcy notice.

The debtor was agent for the Queen Insurance Co., and in December, 1888, was dismissed from their employment. On Dec. 20 the insurance company obtained judgment against the debtor for the sum of £154 17s. An arrangement was then made between the manager of the insurance company and Child, the debtor, by which Child assigned to the company certain book-debts and the lease of a house, and under the same arrangement it was agreed that Child should be credited in the books of the company as against the judgment debt with the sum of £118, being the amount due to him on renewals of policies of insurance effected with the company through his agency. Nothing further was done until November, 1891, when on Nov. 13 a bankruptcy notice was served on the debtor by the company requiring him to pay to the Queen's Insurance Co. the sum of £154 17s., as being the balance due on a final judgment obtained against him. The same day the debtor wrote denying any indebtedness, and pointing out that there was a balance due to him under the above arrangement. On Nov. 26 the debtor filed an affidavit claiming this set-off, and on Dec. 7 he appeared before the registrar in person and applied to have the bankruptcy notice set aside. The registrar ordered him to file before Dec. 11 a further affidavit setting out the particulars of his set-off, and adjourned the hearing until Dec. 14. The affidavit was not filed by Dec. 11, but an affidavit was subsequently filed. At the hearing, objection having been taken that the affidavit had not been filed in time, the registrar refused to read it, and also refused to set aside the bankruptcy notice, and from his decision this appeal was brought. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This case must go back to the county court. The case put forward on behalf of the debtor was, that he had paid the amount of the debt; he suggested that it may turn out that he has paid the whole, but whether or not this is so, at all events he has paid part, and, therefore, it is wrong that the summons should issue claiming £154 17s. as due. F

I wish to say one word as to the effect of s. 4 (1) (g). In the first place, the words of sub-s. (1) (g) are: [His LORDSHIP read sub-s. (1) (g), and continued:] I do not think myself that that section entitles a creditor who has obtained a final judgment to issue a bankruptcy notice for any larger amount than that for which he could lawfully issue execution, and in my judgment, if the circumstances of the case are such that the execution creditor has ceased to be entitled to issue execution for the whole of the debt, then he has ceased to be entitled to issue a bankruptcy notice for the whole amount. The section provides that, when a bankruptcy notice has been issued, and, as I understand it, rightly issued, so far as the requirements of the section are concerned, a debtor has two courses open to him: (i) to "comply with the requirements of the notice" and (ii), G

"or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained." I

In my opinion the occasion for a judgment debtor taking one or other of these two courses does not arise until a bankruptcy notice has been rightly issued. I think that, when once you have got a bankruptcy notice rightly issued, it is no avail that you have nearly complied with it by paying, say, £199 out of £200, or that you have merely a statutory answer of set-off or counterclaim, which to the extent of £199 goes far to equal the judgment debt, but does not go far enough by reason of the £1 deficit. I think that the distinction suggested between payment and

A set-off was well founded; if a creditor has accepted payment, the debtor has no set-off or counterclaim in respect of the amount he has so paid, and he could not sue the creditor for it.

Under these circumstances therefore it seems to me that a debtor who has paid money could have it put as an answer to the case he makes against the bankruptcy notice that his payment of less than the judgment debt was only a set-off of a less amount and was clearly excluded by the latter part of the section. It might have been the intention of the legislature that in all cases the bankruptcy notice should simply state the amount of the original judgment debt, and should take no notice of subsequent payments, but, according to my view, the cases show the contrary. The fact that MATHEW, J., in Re Bates, Ex parte Lindsey (1), thought it necessary that the bankruptcy notice should be amended by altering the amount shows that the proper practice is to give credit in the notice for the amounts paid. I do not forget that MATHEW, J.'s course might have been justified by saying that there was what was equivalent to a stay of execution to the extent of £20; but I think the proper way to look at the judgment is to suppose the learned judge thought that the bankruptcy notice could only be issued for the amount for which execution could have been issued, i.e., for the balance due.

D Where there has been a payment of the judgment debt and acceptance and a fi. fa. is issued for the whole amount the debtor is not obliged to wait until execution is put in, but he can at once say that the execution is wrong.

Taking this view, I need not consider the true effect of the words "execution thereon not having been stayed," or consider whether the judgment creditor has prevented the debtor from paying. It would amount almost to an absurdity to say that the Act of Parliament could require the debtor to pay the whole amount of the debt although a portion of it had been satisfied by payment having been accepted. When I look at the form of the bankruptcy notice and the notice endorsed on the back of the form, I find that both show that the judgment creditor is to deal with the amount due on the judgment debt. This case must go back to the registrar to ascertain whether the whole of this judgment debt has been paid, and if not, what part, if any, of it has been paid.

HENN COLLINS, J.—Counsel for the company said that, assuming all the facts to be correct, they did not answer or displace the right to issue the notice. I was a good deal pressed by s. 4 (1) (g), which seems to contemplate a right existing in a creditor to issue a bankruptcy notice, while he may at the same time be bound to admit that there is a right against him for some amount short of the debt. Counsel for the debtor removed the main difficulty, as he pointed out that, where payment of any part of a judgment debt would defeat a creditor's right to issue execution, then the notice cannot issue; but that a cross-claim or set-off would not necessarily be a ground for staying execution. This brings the case within LORD ESHER, M.R.'s comment in Re Ide, Ex parte Ide (2) where he says (17 Q.B.D. at p. 759):

"The words [of sub-s. (1) (g), seem to me necessarily to imply that the judgment must be one upon which execution could go immediately unless it was stayed."

I Before, then, the question whether or not execution has been stayed is considered we must look and see if the creditor could have insisted upon issuing execution at all, and if so he is entitled to issue execution though there is a cross-claim for the debt even if there is only £1 wanting, for there is nothing to prevent him in that case from proceeding under the Act. On the other hand, if he is not in a position to issue execution as to one portion of the original debt, he is only entitled to issue execution for a balance, and as the debtor here claims a balance in his favour, it may be more than what the creditor is entitled to issue execution for, and so it may be that his bankruptcy notice ought to be dismissed. It is these facts that the learned registrar has refused to look into it. The case must go back A in order that the registrar may find out what amount has been paid.

*Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Non-compliance with bankruptcy notice—
Final judgment—Order in divorce suit against co-respondent for payment of petitioner's costs—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), s. 4
(1) (g).* E

By s. 4 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [see now Bankruptcy Act, 1914,
s. 1 (1) (g)]: "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases . . . (g) If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him
. . . a bankruptcy notice under this Act, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor or the court, and he does not . . .
either comply with the requirements of the notice, or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim set-off or cross-demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained. . . ." I'

An order made in a divorce suit by which a co-respondent is ordered to pay the petitioner's costs is not a "final judgment" within s. 4 (1) (g) of the Act of 1883, and a bankruptcy notice cannot be served under that section in respect thereof. G

E Appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar HOPE dismissing a bankruptcy petition.

The alleged debtor had been co-respondent in a suit in the Probate Division in which a husband, the alleged creditor in the bankruptcy petition, asked for a decree of divorce from his wife on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent. A decree nisi was granted on the ground of adultery between the co-respondent and the wife, and the co-respondent was condemned in the costs incurred and to be incurred on behalf of the petitioner in the cause. Afterwards the decree was made absolute, and an order was made in the suit that the co-respondent should, within seven days from the service of the order, pay to the petitioner or his solicitors the sum of £204 19s. 8d., being the amount of the petitioner's costs as taxed and certified by one of the registrars of the Probate Division. The costs not being paid in obedience to the order, the petitioner served on the co-respondent a bankruptcy order which was drawn up in accordance with the form No. 6, given in appendix to the Bankruptcy Rules. In consequence of non-compliance with this notice, a bankruptcy petition was presented by the creditor. The Registrar dismissed the petition. The creditor appealed.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4 (1):

H "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases . . .
(e) If execution issued against him has been levied by seizure and sale of his goods under process in an action in any court, or in any civil proceeding in the High Court."

I The form of bankruptcy notice, No. 6 in the appendix of forms to the Bankruptcy Rules, is as follows:

"To A. B. of . . . Take notice that within        days after service of this notice on you, excluding the day of such service, you must pay to C. D. of        the sum of £       , claimed by him as being the amount due on a final judgment obtained by him against you in the        Court, dated       ; whereon execution has not been stayed; or you must secure or compound for the said sum to his satisfaction or the satisfaction of the court; or you must satisfy the court that you have a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand against C. D.

which equals or exceeds the sum claimed by him and which you could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained. Dated, etc."

Dec. 3, 1892. LORD ESHER, M.R. In this case the alleged judgment debtor had been co-respondent in a suit in the Divorce Court in which a husband sought for a divorce from his wife on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent. In this suit it was found that the adultery had been committed, and the court ordered that the co-respondent, the alleged debtor, should pay the petitioner his costs of suit. Upon that the alleged creditor has presented a petition to make the co-respondent bankrupt on the ground that he had obtained a final judgment against him, and had served on him a bankruptcy notice which the alleged debtor had not obeyed. The alleged creditor took this course under s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The registrar came to the conclusion that the alleged debtor was not a judgment debtor within the provisions of the subsection, and that therefore he could not declare him bankrupt. The alleged creditor has now appealed to this court.

We have, therefore, to construe s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which describes one set of circumstances in which a debtor may commit an act of bankruptcy. When a man is made a bankrupt he is not only forced to pay what he can of an alleged debt, but all his other creditors are brought in. What happens is not merely the execution of a decree or order; a wide effect is produced on many other people, forcing them to come in and probably to be paid a part only of what is owing to them. This effect is highly penal. We have now to consider the question whether a decree of the Divorce Court is a "final judgment" within the meaning of the Act. It seems to me that it has been held that the construction to be put on the Bankruptcy Act must be a strict construction. In Re Chinery, Ex parte Chinery (1), COTTON, L.J., uses these words (12 Q.B.D. at p. 345):

"Now in legal language and in Acts of Parliament, as well as with regard to the rights of the parties, there is a well-known distinction between a 'judgment' and an 'order.' No doubt the orders under the Judicature Act provide that every order may be enforced in the same manner as a judgment, but still judgments and orders are kept entirely distinct. It is not said that the word 'judgment' shall in other Acts of Parliament include an 'order.' I think we ought to give to the words 'final judgment' in this subsection their strict and proper meaning, i.e., a judgment obtained in an action by which a previously existing liability of the defendant to the plaintiff is ascertained or established—unless there is something to show an intention to use the words in a more extended sense."

That seems to me to mean that we must construe the words in the subsection strictly. Can they apply to an order made in a suit for divorce? The subsection says that if a creditor has obtained a final judgment against the debtor, and has served on him a bankruptcy notice under the Act, and if the debtor does not within a certain limited time

"either comply with the requirements of the notice, or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand, which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained," in such a case the debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy. That shows, in my opinion, that the "judgment" which the creditor has obtained means one obtained in an action in which the debtor might have had a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand which could have been set up. Is it possible to say that a suit

A for divorce is such a proceeding as that? It seems to me impossible. Therefore an order made by the court in a divorce suit is not a "final judgment" within the meaning of those words as used in s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

B There is another consideration which I should like to mention. The bankruptcy notice follows the form, No. 6, given in the rules made under the Act, and calls upon the debtor to pay the amount of the final judgment obtained against him, or to secure or compound for it, or to satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand against the creditor which equals or exceeds the sum claimed by him, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained. It seems to me obvious that the whole of that legislation if construed strictly is inapplicable to an order for the payment of costs in an action in the Divorce Court.

C It has also been contended before us that sub-s. (e) of s. 4 (1) also shows that such an order as we have now to deal with is not within sub-s. (g). By sub-s. (e) a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy if execution issued against him has been levied by seizure and sale of his goods "under process in an action in any court or in any civil proceeding in the High Court." I do not know whether the meaning of sub-s. (g) can be strengthened by sub-s. (e), but the result is the same.

D I am inclined to think that this order is not one on which execution can issue, but is one which the Divorce Court must enforce in its own manner. I do not give any decided opinion on that point, for I have doubts. But I think that the order does not come within sub-s. (g), and that the decision of the registrar was right. The appeal must be dismissed.

E LOPES, L.J.—In this case the alleged judgment debtor was co-respondent in a divorce suit, and a decree was made ordering him to pay the petitioner's costs.

The question for our consideration is, whether that decree or order was a "final judgment" within s. 4 (1) (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. I will not read that subsection; but, to my mind, it is plain that such a decree is not a "final judgment" within the section. Upon the question whether a garnishee order was a final judgment within s. 4 (1) (g), COTTON, L.J., used words in Re Chinery, Ex parte Chinery (1), which are most applicable to the present case. He said (12 Q.B.D. at pp. 345, 346):

G "Undoubtedly a garnishee order absolute is a final order in the proceeding in which it is obtained, but is it a final judgment in the sense which I have mentioned? I think there is a good deal to be found in this subsection which is against that view. It speaks of a 'final judgment' obtained by a creditor against his debtor. To my mind this points to a liability of the debtor to the creditor being established in an action, and not to a proceeding of this kind which is not an action but a statutory proceeding for the purpose not of establishing any liability of the garnishee to the person who obtains the order, but of attaching a debt due by the garnishee to the debtor whose liability to the judgment creditor has been established by the judgment in the action. The latter part of the subsection, I think, confirms this view, and, indeed, everything in it, in my opinion, tends to show that the words 'final judgment' are used in their strict technical sense. And when the legislature enacts that a particular act or default shall be an act of bankruptcy, I think we ought not to give to their words any but their strictly proper meaning, unless we are clearly satisfied that it was the intention of the legislature to use the words in a larger sense."

And in the same case BOWEN, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 346):

"The words 'final judgment,' having then a proper professional meaning, when they are found in a section of an Act of Parliament which is defining acts of bankruptcy, they should be construed as strictly as if they occurred in a section which was defining a misdemeanour, because the commission of an act of bankruptcy entails disabilities on the person who commits it. Is there then anything in sub-s. 1 (g) to show that the legislature meant to use the words 'final judgment' in any wider sense? On the contrary, everything I think tends to show that they intended to use the term in its ordinary technical sense."

I agree with every word of that. Everything goes to show that the order made in this divorce suit is not a "final judgment" within the meaning of s. 4 (1) (g).

Subsection (e) also seems to me to be very important. It applies to an execution against a debtor "under process in an action in any court or in any civil proceeding in the High Court." The legislature has there used much larger words than are used in sub-s. (g) which only speaks of final judgment in an action, and I cannot help thinking that these larger words were used advisedly. It is unnecessary to say now whether sub-s. (e) might not have been used here in order to get an act of bankruptcy, though I am inclined to think so. The words used in sub-s. (g) are clear enough to justify the conclusion we have come to.

KAY, L.J., read the following judgment.—The creditor seeks to make the debtor Binstead a bankrupt. The alleged act of bankruptcy is the non-compliance within the prescribed time with the requirements of a bankruptcy notice under s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It has been decided that this subsection does not mean that the person serving the notice must have been a creditor before the judgment. Obviously such a construction would exclude judgments in actions of tort. It includes all cases in which the applicant becomes a creditor by the judgment. The meaning is, that he must be a judgment creditor when he gives the notice: Re Faithfull, Ex parte Moore (2). It is also settled that a judgment against a defendant for costs may be final, though other parts of the judgment direct accounts or inquiries, the result of which may be to find money due to him: Re Faithfull, Ex parte Moore (2); Re Alexander, Ex parte Alexander (3).

In the present case, if the decree had been a judgment in an action in the Chancery Division or in the Queen's Bench Division, it cannot be denied that it would be a good foundation for a bankruptcy notice. But it is a decree against a co-respondent in a proceeding for divorce ordering him to pay costs. The order was contained in the decree nisi which has since been made absolute. The costs have been taxed, and an order to pay them within a time fixed has since been made, like the four-day order which is familiar in Chancery practice. The real objection is, that this is not a judgment in an action to which alone, it is said, s. 4 (1) (g) refers.

First of all, the word "action" only occurs in the latter part of the subsection which provides that the debtor may show that he has not committed an act of bankruptcy by not complying with the notice, when he can satisfy the court that the debt may be expunged by "a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand" of equal or greater amount "which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained." That includes the case of an action in which for any reason a counterclaim could not be made, as for example, where the provisions as to counterclaim do not apply to the particular court in which the judgment was obtained. If there is no such proceeding in the Divorce Court, that circumstance does not seem to me to prevent the subsection applying. The objection appears to me to be highly technical. The final decision of a divorce proceeding is termed a "decree." The proceeding itself is usually styled a "cause" or "suit." It is commenced not by writ, but by a petition and citation which are served together upon the respondent. But a co-respondent may be decreed to pay damages as well as costs, and if the decree orders him to pay both or either, he is, to all intents and purposes in the same position as a judgment debtor in an action in the Chancery or Queen's Bench Division, and the same remedies by fi. fa. and elegit, or a receiver, may be had in order to render the decree effectual. Before the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the course of proceedings for an injured husband was to

A bring an action at common law for criminal conversation against the alleged adulterer, and if that action succeeded, to apply for an Act of Parliament to dissolve the marriage. This costly proceeding was superseded by that statute which established a new court in which husband and wife might by petition apply for dissolution of the marriage (s. 27); and if the husband applies he may join the alleged adulterer as co-respondent (s. 28), and may claim damages against him, B either by that or by a separate petition (s. 33); and the court may (s. 34) order the co-respondent to pay all or any part of the costs of the proceedings. By s. 31 the dissolution of the marriage is to be by the "decree" of the court. In ss. 33 and 34, relating to the damages and costs which the co-respondent may be ordered to pay, the word "decree" is not used. But s. 33 provides that all the enactments contained in the Act with reference to the hearing and decision of petitions, shall C apply to the hearing of a petition for damages, and by s. 34 the order for costs may be made when the alleged adulterer is a co-respondent to a petition for dissolution. In practice, I presume, the order usually is made, as it was here, as part of the decree.

It seems to me that no difference can for this purpose be made between a decree giving damages and costs against a co-respondent and a decree giving costs only. D If the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has excepted such a person from its description of a judgment debtor who commits an act of bankruptcy by failing to comply with a bankruptcy notice, there does not appear to be any sufficient reason for such an exception. But pursuing the investigation, the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, s. 3, united the Court of Chancery, the Courts of Common Law, of Probate, Admiralty, the Divorce Court, and the London Court of Bankruptcy, into one E Supreme Court of Judicature in England, and by ss. 4 and 5 made them the High Court and by s. 16 vested in that High Court the jurisdiction of each and every of them, and also of the courts created by commissioners of assize [see now Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, ss. 1, 2, 18]. Section 100 [see now s. 225 of the 1925 Act] provides that, in the construction of that statute, "cause"

F "shall include any action, suit, or other original proceeding between a plaintiff and a defendant, and any criminal proceeding by the Crown";

"suit" shall include "action"; "action" shall mean

G "a civil proceeding commenced by writ, or in such other manner as may be prescribed by rules of court, and shall not include a criminal proceeding by the Crown"; and "judgment" shall include decree. Therefore a "suit or cause" includes an "action" and a "judgment" includes a "decree."

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was passed ten years later, and when it speaks of a "judgment creditor" why should not the word "judgment" include a "decree"? H In the Court of Chancery proceedings were formerly called suits, and the decision of a suit was by decree. The suit was commenced by bill, and the appearance of the defendants was obtained by writ of subpoena, or, in certain cases, by service of a copy of the bill. By R.S.C., Ord. 1, suits in Chancery are to be called actions, and by Ord. 2 are to be commenced by writ, and by Ord. 40 the judgment of the court is to be obtained by motion for judgment. Order 68 provides that I nothing in the rules shall, save as expressly provided, affect the procedure or practice in proceedings in divorce. Accordingly, the Divorce Court is governed by its own rules in these respects, and its causes or suits are not called actions, and its decisions are not called judgments, but decrees.

This, and, as I think, this only, creates the difficulty. In strict language, a decree of the Divorce Court is not called a "judgment," nor is a suit for divorce called an "action." Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, contains eight subsections, every one of which applies to this debtor, unless sub-s. (1) (g) is an exception. Subsection (1) (e) provides that "execution levied by seizure and sale" of a debtor's goods "under process in an action in any court, or in any civil proceeding in the High Court," shall be an act of bankruptcy. Therefore, if there had been such an execution by seizure and sale under this decree, as, I understand, according to the ordinary practice in the Divorce Court, there might be, if the correspondent had goods which could be seized, he might be made a bankrupt. But in sub-s. (1) (e) there are the words "in any civil proceeding in the High Court," which, it is said, would include this decree in the Divorce Court. However, I cannot see any reason for ascribing to the legislature an intention to allow the debtor to be made bankrupt under sub-s. (1) (e) and not under sub-s. (1) (g). COTTON, L.J., in Re Chinery, Ex parte Chinery (1) and again in Re Faithfull, Ex parte Moore (2) said that, as under sub-s. (1) (g) there is a new act of bankruptcy, created for the first time by the Act of 1883, "we ought to give the words their strict meaning." This language was adopted by the Master of the Rolls in Re Riddell, Ex parte Earl of Strathmore (4). Following that rule of construction, I most reluctantly come to the conclusion that "judgment in an action" does not strictly describe or include a decree in a suit for divorce. Therefore, the decision in the court below was right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Contract—Conclusion of contract—Acceptance of offer—Acceptance by letter—Acceptance at time of posting letter—Effect of letter withdrawing offer posted before but received after posting of letter of acceptance.

The ordinary rule is that to constitute a contract there must be an offer, an acceptance, and a communication of that acceptance to the person making the offer. Where the circumstances are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that, according to the ordinary usages of mankind, the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance of an offer, the acceptance is complete as soon as it is posted.

On July 7, 1891, the secretary of a building society handed to the plaintiff in the office of the society at Liverpool a letter giving him the refusal of the F. property at £750 for fourteen days. The plaintiff had been for some time in negotiation for the property, and had on two previous occasions made offers for the purchase of it which were not accepted by the society. The plaintiff being unable to write except to sign his name, the offers were made by means of letters, written by the secretary in the office of the society and signed by the plaintiff there. The plaintiff, who resided at Birkenhead, took away with him to that town the letter of July 7, and on July 8 a letter was posted in Birkenhead at 3.50 p.m., written by his solicitor, accepting the offer on his behalf. This letter was not received at the society's office until 8.30 p.m., on the same day, which was after office hours. On the same day a letter was

A sent to the plaintiff by the secretary of the society withdrawing the offer of July 7. This letter was posted in Liverpool between 12 and 1 p.m., and was received in Birkenhead at 5.30 p.m. In an action by the plaintiff for specific performance of the contract of sale,

B Held: in the circumstances it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that the plaintiff would communicate his acceptance by post, and, therefore, the contract was complete as soon as the letter of acceptance was posted, the withdrawal was too late, and the plaintiff was entitled to a decree of specific performance.

Appeal from a decision of BRISTOW, V.-C., in favour of the defendants in an action for the specific performance of a contract to sell to the plaintiff certain house property situate in Flamank Street, Birkenhead.

I On July 7, 1891, the secretary of the building society whom the defendants represented handed to the plaintiff, in the office of the society at Liverpool, a letter in these terms:

"I hereby give you the refusal of the Flamank Street property at £750 for fourteen days."

The plaintiff had been for some time in negotiation for the property, and had on two previous occasions made offers for the purchase of it, which were not accepted by the society. These offers were made by means of letters written by the secretary in the office of the society and signed by the plaintiff there. The plaintiff was unable to write except to sign his name. The plaintiff resided in Birkenhead, and he took away with him to that town the letter of July 7 containing the offer of the society. On July 8 a letter was posted in Birkenhead at 3.50 p.m. written by his solicitor, accepting on his behalf the offer to sell the property at £750. This letter was not received at the defendants' office until 8.30 p.m., after office hours, the office being closed at six o'clock. On the same day a letter was addressed to the plaintiff by the secretary of the building society in these terms:

"Please take notice that my letter of the 7th inst. giving you the option of purchasing the property at Flamank Street, Birkenhead, at £750, for fourteen days, is withdrawn and the offer cancelled."

This letter was posted in Liverpool between 12 and 1 p.m., and was received in Birkenhead at 5.30 p.m. It will thus be seen that it was received before the plaintiff's letter of acceptance had reached Liverpool, but after it had been posted. The only other material fact was that on July 8 the secretary of the building society sold the same premises to Mr. Miller for the sum of £760, but the receipt for the deposit paid in respect of the purchase stated that it was subject to being able to withdraw the letter to the plaintiff giving him fourteen days option of purchase. The Vice-Chancellor decided that the revocation was good, and the plaintiff appealed.

Mar. 26, 1892. LORD HERSCHELL read the following judgment in which he stated the facts, and continued.—If the acceptance by the plaintiff of the defendants' offer is to be treated as complete at the time the letter containing it was posted, I can entertain no doubt that the society's attempted revocation of the offer was wholly ineffectual. I think that a person who has made an offer must be considered as continuously making it until he has brought to the knowledge of the person to whom it was made that it is withdrawn. This seems to me to be in accordance with the reasoning of the Court of King's Bench in Adams v. Lindsell (3), which was approved by the Lord Chancellor in Dunlop v. Higgins (4), and also with the opinion of MELLISH, L.J., in Re Imperial Land Co. of Marseilles, Harris' Case (5). The very point was decided in Byrne & Co. v. Leon Van Tienhoven & Co. (1) by LINDLEY, L.J., and his decision was subsequently followed by LUSH, J., in Stevenson, Jaques & Co. v. McLean (2).

The grounds upon which it has been held that the acceptance of an offer is complete when it is posted have, I think, no application to the revocation or modification of an offer. These can be no more effectual than the offer itself, unless brought to the mind of the person to whom the offer is made. But it is contended on behalf of the defendants that the acceptance was complete only when received by them, and not on the letter being posted.

It cannot, of course, be denied, after the decision in Dunlop v. Higgins (4) in the House of Lords, that, where an offer has been made through the medium of the post, the contract is complete as soon as the acceptance of the offer is posted; but that decision is said to be inapplicable here, inasmuch as the letter containing the offer was not sent by post to Birkenhead, but handed to the plaintiff in the defendants' office at Liverpool. The question therefore arises, in what circumstances the acceptance of an offer is to be regarded as complete as soon as it is posted.

In Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Co. v. Grant (6) BAGGALLAY, L.J., said that he thought that the principle established in Dunlop v. Higgins (4) is limited in its application to cases in which, by reason of general usage, or of the relations between the parties to any particular transactions, or of the terms in which the offer is made, the acceptance of such offer by a letter through the post

A is expressly or impliedly authorised. And in the same case THESTIGER, L.J., based his judgment on the defendant having made an application for shares under circumstances from which it must be implied that he authorised the company, in the event of their allotting the shares applied for, to send the notice of allotment by post. The facts of that case were, that the defendant had, in Swansea, where he resided, handed a letter of application to an agent of the company, their place of business being situate in London. It was from these circumstances that the lords justices implied an authority to the company to accept the defendant's offer to take shares through the medium of the post.

Applying the law thus laid down by the Court of Appeal, I think in the present case an authority to accept by post must be implied. Although the plaintiff received the offer at the defendants' office in Liverpool, he resided in another town, and it must have been in contemplation that he would take the offer, which by its terms was to remain open for some days, with him to his place of residence, and those who made the offer must have known that it would be according to the ordinary usages of mankind, that if he accepted it he should communicate his acceptance by means of the post.

I am not sure that I should myself have regarded the doctrine that an acceptance is complete as soon as the letter containing it is posted as resting upon an implied authority by the person making the offer to the person receiving it to accept by those means. It strikes me as somewhat artificial to speak of the person to whom the offer is made as having the implied authority of the other party to send his acceptance by post. He needs no authority to transmit the acceptance through any particular channel; he may select what means he pleases, the Post Office no less than any other. The only effect of the supposed authority is to make the acceptance complete so soon as it is posted, and authority will obviously be implied only when the tribunal considers that it is a case in which this result ought to be reached. I should prefer to state the rule thus: Where the circumstances are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that, according to the ordinary usages of mankind, the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance of an offer, the acceptance is complete as soon as it is posted. It matters not in which way the proposition be stated; the present case is in either view within it.

The learned Vice-Chancellor appears to have based his decision to some extent on the fact that before the acceptance was posted the defendants had sold the property to another person. Dickinson v. Dodds (7) was relied upon in support of that defence. In that case, however, the plaintiff knew of the subsequent sale before he accepted the offer, which, in my judgment, distinguishes it entirely from the present case. For the reasons I have given I think the judgment must be reversed and the usual decree for specific performance made. The defendants must pay the costs of the appeal and of the action.

H LINDLEY, L.J.—I concur.

KAY, L.J.—On July 7, 1881, the defendants gave to the plaintiff, who was then in their office in Liverpool, an offer in writing to sell him certain real property at Birkenhead, where the plaintiff resided. The plaintiff had been on several previous occasions at their office on this and like business. He was not able to write beyond signing his name. On July 8 his solicitor wrote by his direction accepting the offer. This letter was posted at 3.50 p.m., and arrived at 8.30 the same evening. This was after office hours, and it was not opened till ten o'clock next morning. In the meantime, on the same day, the defendants wrote withdrawing their offer, and posted their letter between 12 and 1 p.m. This was received and opened at 5.30 the same evening. On the same day the defendants entered into a contract to sell the same property to another person, with an express condition, if they were able to withdraw their offer to the plaintiff.

The question is: Was the withdrawal in time or too late? Dunlop v. Higgins (4) has decided that, where a letter sent by post was a proper mode of acceptance, the contract was complete from the time the letter was posted. In that case the letter was actually received, though by fault of the Post Office there was some delay in its transmission. Upon receipt of it the offer was withdrawn. The question was the same as in the present case, except that the withdrawal was after the actual receipt of the acceptance, which was treated as being too late. It was held that by posting the letter in due time the party by the usage of trade had done all that he was bound to do. He could not be responsible for the delay of the Post Office in delivering the letter, therefore there was from the time of the posting a valid acceptance. It might have still been doubtful whether posting a letter of acceptance in time would amount to an acceptance if the letter was never received. The ordinary rule is that to constitute a contract there must be an offer, an acceptance, and a communication of that acceptance to the person making the offer: per LORD BLACKBURN in Brogden v. Metropolitan Rail. Co. (8); and per LORD BRAMWELL in Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Co. v. Grant (6).

It may be that where the communication is in fact received the contract may date back to the time of posting the acceptance; but there is considerable reason for holding that if never received the posting might be treated as a nullity. The point was so decided in British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson (9), and BRAMWELL, L.J., refers to this point in his judgment in Household Fire & Carriage Accident Insurance Co. v. Grant (6). However, in the last-mentioned case, which is a decision binding upon this court, the Court of Appeal, BRAMWELL, L.J., dissenting, held that the posting of a letter of allotment in answer to an application for shares constituted a binding contract to take the shares though the letter of allotment was not received. In his judgment in that case THESSIGER, L.J., refers to Re National Savings Bank Association, Hebb's Case (10), in which the decision in Dunlop v. Higgins (4) has been explained by saying that the Post Office was treated as the common agent of both contracting parties. That reason is not satisfactory. The Post Office are only carriers between them; they are agents to convey the communication, not to receive it. The communication is not made to the Post Office, but by their agency as carriers. The difference is between saying, "Tell my agent A. if you accept," and "Send your answer to me by A." In the former case A. is to be the intelligent recipient of the acceptance; in the latter he is only to convey the communication to the person making the offer, which he may do by a letter knowing nothing of its contents. The Post Office are only agents in the latter sense. All that Dunlop v. Higgins (4) decided was, that the acceptor of the offer having properly posted his acceptance was not responsible for the delay of the Post Office in delivering it, so that after receipt the other party could not rescind on the ground of that delay. I cannot help thinking that the decision has been treated as going much further than the House of Lords intended.

BAGGALLAY, L.J., in his judgment in Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Co. v. Grant (6), treats it (4 Ex.D. at p. 228) as applicable to cases in which

"by reason of general usage or of the relations between the parties to any particular transactions, or of the terms in which the offer is made, the acceptance of such offer by a letter through the post is expressly or impliedly authorised."

If for authorised the word "contemplated" is substituted I should be disposed to agree with this dictum. But I would rather express it thus: "Posting an acceptance of an offer may be sufficient where it can fairly be inferred from the circumstances of the case that the acceptance might be sent by post." Is that a proper inference in the present case? I think it is. One party resided in Liverpool, the other in Birkenhead. The acceptance would be expected to be in writing, the subject of purchase being real estate. These and the other circumstances to which

A I have alluded, in my opinion, warrant the inference that both parties contemplated that a letter sent by post was a mode by which the acceptance might be communicated. I think, therefore, that we are bound by authority to hold that the contract was complete at 3.50 p.m. on July 8, when the letter of acceptance was posted, and before the letter of withdrawal was received.

B Then what was the effect of the withdrawal by the letter posted between twelve and one the same day and received in the evening? Did that take effect from the time of posting? It has never been held that this doctrine applies to a letter withdrawing the offer. Take the cases alluded to by BRAMWELL, L.J., in Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Co. v. Grant (6). A notice by a tenant to quit can have no operation till it comes to the actual knowledge of the person to whom it is addressed. An offer to sell is nothing until it is actually received.

C No doubt there is the seeming anomaly pointed out by LORD BRAMWELL, in his judgment, that the same letter might contain an acceptance, and also such a notice or offer as to other property, and that when posted it would be effectual as to the acceptance and not as to the notice or offer. But the anomaly, if it be one, arises from the different nature of the two communications. As to the acceptance, if it was contemplated that it might be sent by post, the acceptor, according to D the judgment of LORD COTTENHAM in Dunlop v. Higgins (4), has done all that he was bound to do by posting the letter. But this cannot be said as to the notice of withdrawal. That was not a contemplated proceeding. The person withdrawing was bound to bring his change of purpose to the knowledge of the other party, and as this was not done in this case till after the letter of acceptance was posted, I am of opinion that it was too late. A similar point has been decided in E Byrne & Co. v. Leon Van Tienhoven & Co. (1) and Stevenson, Jaques & Co. v. McLean (2), and I agree with those decisions.

Master and Servant—Liability of master for act of servant—Act by servant in course of employment—Hire by master of horse and carriage—Negligence of servant—Injury to horse.

The defendant hired from the plaintiff a horse and carriage. At the end of the day's work, the defendant's coachman, instead of taking the horse back to its stable as he had been instructed, went out of his way for his own purpose. While he was so doing the horse was injured as a result of his negligence. In an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for damages,

Held: the coachman was driving the horse in the course of his employment and the defendant was liable for his negligence.

Appeal from a decision of the learned judge of Bloomsbury County Court.

The plaintiff company let out a horse and carriage to the defendant at £2 2s. per week. The defendant was a doctor, and arrived after his rounds at his house at 2 p.m. on Dec. 29, and told his coachman that he would not be wanted any more, and that he could go home (meaning to the stables). On the way to the stables the coachman pulled up at a public-house, and there met a friend, whom he drove in a different direction from that in which were the stables, thus deviating from his course. On returning from the direction he had taken to the stables, an accident occurred owing to his negligent driving, whereby the plaintiff's horse was injured. The learned county court judge, before whom the action was tried, decided that the hirer was not responsible, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs appealed.

A Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and H. M. Sturges for the plaintiff company.
W. Wills for the defendant.

B July 4, 1891. CAVE, J., read the following judgment of the court.—The question raised in this case is whether a person who has hired a horse and carriage for a year is responsible to the owner of the horse and carriage for damage done to them by the negligent driving of the hirer's servant, where the servant instead of taking the horse and carriage to his master's stables in the ordinary course of his duty, for his own purposes and to serve a friend takes the horse and carriage in a contrary direction, and they are injured in consequence of his negligent driving while thus engaged contrary to his duty. The county court judge held that the
C hirer was not responsible on the authority of Storey v. Ashton (1), in which it was held, under similar circumstances, that the master was not liable to a person who had been run over and injured by the servant, on the ground that the servant when he ran over the plaintiff was not acting in the course of his employment as servant.

D Counsel for the defendant contended that the ground of the hirer's liability to the owner of the horse and carriage is the same as the ground of his liability to a person who is injured by the negligent act of his servant, but we are unable to agree with this contention. Where a wayfarer is injured by the negligence of a person who is driving along a highway, he has a right of action founded on tort against the driver, and if the driver is a servant in the course of his employment,
E the person injured has also a remedy against the master on the principle respondeat superior; but when a man hires a horse and carriage, there is an implied obligation on his part arising out of the contract to return them in the condition in which he received them, fair wear and tear and certain accidents excepted, and if they are injured by the negligence of the servant while driving in the course of his employment, the latter's remedy is by action on the contract, and can be enforced against the hirer only, and not against his servant.

F That there is a difference between the hirer's liability to the owner, and his liability to a wayfarer injured by the negligence of the person driving the carriage, is plain from the following instances. A. hires a horse and carriage for a year, and lends it for a day to B., who negligently drives over and injures C., at the same time injuring the horse and carriage. In that case, A. is not responsible to C., because B. is not his servant, and consequently the maxim respondeat superior
G does not apply, but he is responsible to the owner of the horse and carriage for the damage done by B.'s negligence; so, again, if two partners hire a horse and cart for the purposes of their business, and one of them while driving the cart in the usual course of their business negligently runs against and injures a person passing along the highway, and at the same time injures the horse and cart, the partner driving alone is responsible to the person injured, but both are responsible to the
H owner of the horse and cart they had hired. The responsibility of the hirer to the person from whom he hires is a responsibility arising out of contract; his responsibility to a person run over by the negligent driving of the horse and cart arises out of tort.

I Is there any authority for saying the responsibility of the hirer to take reasonable care of the goods hired does not extend to all injuries caused by the negligence of his servant to whom he has entrusted the care of them? Counsel for the defendant cited Finucane v. Small (2) and Foster v. Essex Bank (3), in which it was held that the hirer was not responsible where his servant had stolen the goods hired. But in those cases there was an act of the servant which was tortious as against the lettor of the goods, and which gave him a right of action against the servant for a conversion of the goods. But in this case the act of the servant was not tortious as against the owner of the horse and carriage. If the horse and carriage had got back safely to the stable, the owner would have had no right of action against the servant, for, although the servant, as against his master, would have committed a breach of the duty arising out of the relationship of master and servant, he would not have been guilty of any tortious act as against the owner. Such an act would certainly not have amounted to a conversion of the horse and carriage by the servant, nor, as against the owner, would it have amounted to a trespass, seeing that the person who was entitled to the possession of the horse and carriage during the period occupied by the journey was the hirer, and not the owner. Nor could the fact that the horse and carriage were injured during the journey give the owner a cause of action against the servant, because it was not the owner who had entrusted the horse and carriage to the servant, but the hirer, his master, and consequently the duty of the servant to take care of them was a duty arising out of the relationship of master and servant, and owing to the master, and was not a duty owing to the owner, because there was no contractual relationship between the servant and the owner. The hirer, then, could maintain an action against the servant for breach of duty in the wrongful and negligent use of the horse and carriage by which they were damaged. But the owner could maintain no such action, because, as we have pointed out, there was no invasion by the servant of the lettor's right of ownership, and no contractual relation between them.

If we consider the case on the general principles of the public benefit, we arrive at the same result. Where one of two innocent parties has to suffer a loss from the misconduct of a third party, it is for the public advantage that the loss should fall in such a way as to diminish the probabilities of such a thing happening again, or, in other words, that it should fall on the one of the two who could most easily have prevented the happening or the recurrence of the mischief. If, under the circumstances, the loss is to fall on the owner, who does not engage and cannot dismiss the servant, and who cannot recover it against him, the result is that it falls on one who could not have guarded beforehand against this accident, and who cannot prevent its recurrence except by refusing to let out his horse and carriage in the future, which, so far from being a public benefit, is distinctly a public disadvantage, as tending to throw endless impediments in the way of business, and to render the letting and hiring of horses and carriages more expensive. If the loss is to fall on the hirer, it falls on one who thereby will be led to exercise greater care in the selection of a servant in the future, who can punish the servant for his misconduct by dismissing him, and who (theoretically, at all events), has a right of action against the servant.

No case in point can be found on either side of the question, but, on the general considerations set out above, we are of opinion that the hirer is liable, and consequently we must allow the appeal and remit the case for re-trial, and the defendant must pay the costs of appeal and such costs of the court below as have been thrown away.

[Reported 66 L.T. 718; 36 Sol. Jo. 504]

B Executor—Powers—Power to carry on business of testator—Business carried on—Priority of payment of executors' costs and expenses over payment of trading debts.

A testator by his will directed his executors to carry on his business. This they did, and incurred certain debts. A creditor of the testator then commenced an administration action, and obtained judgment. The assets were

C insufficient to pay both the costs and expenses of the executors and the debts incurred by them in carrying on the business. The minutes having been referred to the judge by order of the district registrar,

Held: the executors had continued the business lawfully and with the consent of the creditors, and so they were entitled to be paid out of the assets their costs and expenses in priority to the debts incurred by them in carrying

D on the business.

Notes. Subject to the priority of funeral, testamentary, and administrative expenses, the priorities of debts and liabilities where the estate is insolvent are now to be determined by the same rules as apply in the case of bankruptcy: see the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 34 (1), and Sched. 2 (9 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 737, 766). Further Consideration of administration action to determine priority of payment between executors' costs and expenses and debts incurred by them in carrying on the testator's business.

G The testator, Harold Owen, by his will, directed his executors to carry on his business. The executors carried on the business, paid off some of the debts of the testator, and paid some of the profits into court. Creditors of the testator commenced an action for the administration of the estate, and obtained judgment. The business was sold by order of the court. On further consideration the plaintiffs, the testator's creditors, were postponed payment of their debts in favour

H of the executors and of the creditors of the business as carried on by the executors after the death of the testator. Minutes were prepared by counsel for the executors on the footing that the executors were to be paid first their costs and expenses, and then the creditors with whom debts were contracted by the executors. The assets were insufficient, and these creditors objected. The district registrar

I referred the minutes to the judge to be spoken to.

Church for the executors.

Clare for the creditors.

KEKEWICH, J.—The point which has been argued today was not at all present to my mind last week. I think also that it was not present to the mind of the learned counsel who then addressed me. At any rate it was not put forward by them as a point worthy of consideration. What I then decided was that, as between the plaintiffs in the action, who were creditors of the testator, and the creditors of the business which was carried on by the executors after the testator's decease, the plaintiffs were to be postponed. In postponing the plaintiffs I intended the available assets to be applied in the payment of the executors' costs and expenses, and the creditors whom I have referred to as the creditors of the business, creditors who have a personal claim against the executors, and who were not creditors of the testator. I did not intend to decide, and did not decide, that there was any priority of the creditors' debts over the executors' costs and expenses, because it did not occur to me that the assets were insufficient to pay them both; and whether they should be paid in one order or the other (there being enough, as was assumed) of course was immaterial. But now it appears that there is not enough for both. More than that, I conclude that, if the executors are paid their costs, there will be only a very small sum for the creditors—I think I am right as regards the figures; and if, on the other hand, the creditors are paid in full, there will be nothing left for the executors. Therefore the point comes to be of very great importance whether the executors or the creditors are to be paid first.

The ordinary rule in ordinary administrations, in cases before the court or not, is perfectly clear, and is stated concisely by LORD SELBORNE in Stott v. Milne (1), where he says (25 Ch.D. at p. 715):

"The right of trustees [executors are in the same position] to indemnify against all costs and expenses properly incurred by them in the execution of the trust is a first charge on all the trust property, both income and corpus."

Of course the costs properly incurred include costs of administration, whether either the executors are defendants in an action, and are not ordered to pay the costs personally, or are plaintiffs in an action properly commenced by them. So that, if we were dealing with such a class of cases, there could be no question at all.

Then it is suggested that, because we are considering the creditors, not of the testator, but of the business, there is a difference. As far as I am aware, the question has not been discussed since the decision in Dowse v. Gorton (2), and I must express an opinion. What is the principle on which the creditors have any claim against the testator's estate? It is a right of indemnity through the executors; they are personal creditors of the executors; they are not creditors of the testator. The executors having a right of indemnity against the whole of the testator's estate, the creditors have a right through the executors—stand in their shoes, as it is sometimes expressed. Instead of working the administration through the executors, the court might pay the creditors direct out of the estate. This is what it comes to. The executors are liable to the creditors, and the executors have a right of indemnity, so the creditors are paid.

This is on the footing that the executors have done their duty, and have not exceeded their duty. If they have done what is wrong, a different result follows. That is put plainly by LORD MACNAGHTEN in his judgment in Dowse v. Gorton (2) (post p. 1235):

"Creditors of a deceased trader whose business has been continued by his executors, when they come for an administration decree, must treat the continuance of the business either as proper or as improper. If the business has been properly continued as between the executors and the creditors, or if the creditors choose to treat it so, which comes to the same thing, the executors are entitled to be indemnified against all liabilities properly incurred in carrying it on. If it has been improperly continued, and the creditors choose to treat the continuance as improper (which, of course, they are not bound to do), they may proceed in the proper way to make the executors accountable for the value of the assets used in carrying on the business, and they may also follow the assets and obtain a charge on the business in the hands of the executors for the value of the assets misapplied, with interest thereon; and they may enforce the charge, if necessary, by means of a receiver and a sale. Then there can be no room for any claim to indemnity on the part of the executors.

- A The charge in favour of the trust estate must be satisfied first. The executors can only take what is left. But the creditors must do one thing or the other. Though they are not bound by what they do in ignorance, and may, by leave of the court, sue in respect of wilful default after having taken the usual order, they cannot approbate and reprobate in one breath."
- B That, to my mind, properly applied, settles the question I have to consider here. It has been assumed, and assumed properly, that here the creditors have approbated. The executors have continued the business lawfully and with the assent of the creditors, and the creditors, adopting that course, cannot come in and say they will oust the executors from the proper possession of what it is right they should be paid, namely, their costs and expenses in priority to everything else. They may have a right against the executors personally, but it would be inconsistent with the words of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Dowse v. Gorton (2) to say that they had a right against the assets in priority to the executors. Therefore, the general rule applies, and the executors must be paid their costs and expenses first, and the minutes as drawn are right.

Appeal from Tunbridge Wells County Court.

Frederick Bird had been a tenant of the King's Arms, a public-house, since 1886 up to the time of his death. Mrs. Simpson was the landlady of the house. Bird died intestate and insolvent, and amongst others Mrs. Simpson was a creditor to the amount of £220 for rent of the premises and for goods supplied. The defendant Bird, who was the widow of Frederick Bird, was permitted by Mrs. Simpson to retain possession of the house, and to carry on the business. Mrs. Simpson sent her manager to make a valuation of the stock-in-trade, and this realised £175. It was then arranged that Mrs. Bird should transfer the stock, at that valuation, to Mrs. Simpson in part payment of the debt owing to her. This was accordingly done, and £175 was struck off the amount of the debt. Mrs. Bird then took out letters of administration to her husband's estate.

An action was then brought in the county court by Hursell, the plaintiff, who was one of Bird's creditors, to administer his estate as an intestate, and he joined Mrs. Simpson also as a defendant, suing her as an executrix de son tort on the ground that she had put herself in that position by receiving the value of the stock-in-trade as part payment of the debt owing to her. The learned judge in the county court granted a decree for administration against the defendant Mrs. Bird, but, as regards the action against the other defendant Mrs. Simpson, he dismissed it with costs, without giving any reasons, however, for so doing. The plaintiff appealed against the dismissal of the suit against Mrs. Simpson.

Upjohn for the defendant Mrs. Simpson.

MATHEW, J.—The judgment of the learned judge in the county court must be affirmed. This case has been argued at great length owing to the fact that the judge had given judgment in favour of Mrs. Simpson without informing this court of the grounds of his decision, and the real question that we have to decide has to be found out without the assistance of the judge's notes. On looking closely into the case, however, it seems that the sole question that we have to decide is whether Mrs. Simpson has rendered herself liable as an executrix de son tort. It appears that Mrs. Bird, the widow, had made herself an executrix de son tort of her husband, and that Mrs. Simpson, who was a creditor of the deceased, had obtained payment of part of her debt from Mrs. Bird. It was then sought by the plaintiff to make Mrs. Simpson liable as an executrix de son tort for having done so; but this it is clear he cannot do. The law is, that a creditor who obtains payment of his debt from an executor de son tort does not, by reason of so doing, become an executor de son tort himself. I am of opinion, therefore, that Mrs. Simpson was rightly dismissed from this suit, and the judgment of the learned county court must be affirmed.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Here Bird was a yearly tenant of Mrs. Simpson, and at his death owed her money for rent and goods supplied. Mrs. Simpson sends her agent to get that rent and the other money that was due. The stock-in-trade is valued, and the widow is induced to hand over the house, including the stock-in-trade, at a valuation, as a going concern, in satisfaction of a part of the debt due by the deceased to Mrs. Simpson. The latter, however, does not, by receiving this payment, render herself liable as an executrix de son tort. The law upon the subject is clear: it is, that a creditor getting his debt, whether in money or in kind, does not thereby become an executor de son tort. This is laid down in Paull v. Simpson (1) and in Hill v. Curtis (2),

A and we must follow those cases, and the judgment in the court below must be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

Bastardy—Summons—Service—Service at "last place of abode" in England—Defendant residing abroad.

A bastardy summons was left at the putative father's last place of abode in England. At the hearing the justices found, in his absence, that the summons had been duly served on him and, on the corroborated evidence of the mother, made an order against him under s. 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872. The putative father applied for the issue of a writ of certiorari to bring up the order to be quashed on the ground that the summons had not been properly served. On the application fresh evidence was adduced that, when the summons was served, the putative father was in America and had a place of abode there.

Held: the court had power to review the decision of the justices on the question of service of the summons; as at the date of service the putative father had a place of residence in America, the summons had not been duly served; and, therefore, the justices had no jurisdiction to proceed under s. 4 of the Act of 1872, and a writ of certiorari would issue to quash the order.

H

Notes. That part of s. 4 of the repealed Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, relating to service of the summons, has been replaced by r. 76 (1) (a), (b) of the Magistrates' Courts Rules, 1952, S.I. 1952, No. 2190: 13 HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, title MAGISTRATES.

Appeal by the applicant from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and WRIGHT, J.), refusing to grant a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up to be quashed an affiliation order made by the justices against the applicant under s. 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, on the ground that the summons was not duly served.

The applicant, Riley, applied for a rule nisi, calling upon Sir James Farmer and Richard Husband, Esq., justices of Salford, to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up an affiliation order of the justices, made on Mar. 25, 1891, adjudging the applicant to be the putative father of a bastard child of Elizabeth Howarth, on the grounds that when the summons was issued and alleged to be served the applicant's place of abode was in America, and the order was made in his absence and without notice to him, and without his knowledge thereof, or of the summons, and that the order was made without jurisdiction. the summons not having been served personally nor left at the applicant's last place of abode. E

On Feb. 26, 1891, Elizabeth Howarth was delivered of a bastard child, of which she alleged that the applicant was the father, and obtained a summons against him, under s. 3 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872. The applicant had been living at his father's house in Salford, and had no other place of abode in England. The summons was obtained on Mar. 13, 1891, and on that day was left at the house of the applicant's father. On Mar. 25 the summons came on to be heard; the applicant himself was not present; it was proved that the summons had been left at the house of the applicant's father on Mar. 13, and a witness swore that she had seen the applicant in Salford on Mar. 15, but the applicant's father stated that he had gone to America in February. The complainant gave evidence, which was corroborated, that the applicant was the father of the child, and the justices found that the summons had been actually served upon the applicant, and made an order adjudging him to be the putative father of such bastard child, and ordered him to pay 5s. a week until the child was fourteen. Upon the application for a certiorari it appeared from fresh evidence, then adduced upon affidavit, that the applicant was actually in America on Mar. 5, 1891, that he had gone there with the intention to stay and settle down, and had a place of abode at his brother's house in America. He swore that as soon as he heard of the order he determined to return to England to contest it; that he was prevented by illness from returning until September; that he was taken ill on arriving in England, and that owing to those causes his application for a certiorari was not made until more than six months after the date of the order of the justices. F G H I

The application for a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up the order to be quashed was refused by the Divisional Court and the applicant appealed.

A On the question of the application being out of time, the court extended the time.

Cluer for the justices.

Le Riche for the applicant.

B LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the justices made an order against the applicant for the rule adjudging him to be the putative father of a child born in England, upon the application of its mother. The man appeals upon the ground that the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order, and his appeal is not against any proceeding taken to enforce that order, but is an application for a certiorari to bring up that order to be quashed.

C If this were a case of proceedings taken to enforce the order of the justices, I think that Brittain v. Kinnaird (1) would be conclusive to show that, inasmuch as the justices had jurisdiction to inquire whether service of the summons had been properly made, this court could not inquire into the question whether the decision of the justices was right or wrong. This, however, is an application for a certiorari to bring up the order to be quashed, and, therefore, R. v. Evans and Yale (2) is a clear authority that the court can not only inquire whether there was any evidence before the justices to justify their order, but can also consider whether it agrees with the justices in their findings upon the facts. The decision in R. v. Evans and Yale (2) seems to be clear that, upon an application for a certiorari, the court can say whether it agrees with the finding of the justices, and R. v. Lee (3), decided by HAWKINS and CHARLES, JJ., is to the same effect. I think that we cannot overrule R. v. Evans and Yale (2) but must follow it, and uphold the distinction drawn by that case that upon proceedings to enforce an order of justices the court cannot inquire whether the order was right or wrong, but that if an application is made to bring up an order to be quashed the court is bound to consider the evidence which was before the justices, and to say then whether the order was right or not.

E Further than that, if we have jurisdiction to make that inquiry, we are not confined to the evidence which was before the justices, but can hear further evidence. In this case we are called upon to say whether the decision of the justices upon a preliminary point was right or wrong. It is not material for us to consider whether, if the evidence had been the same before us as it was before the justices, we would have agreed with their decision or not, for we have now further evidence before us. The justices decided, upon the evidence before them, that service of the summons had been made at the house in which the applicant then abode at the time of the service, and was abiding for at least two days after, and they naturally inferred that the summons came to his knowledge. Can we now agree with that decision? I disregard the affidavit of the woman who swore at the hearing that she had seen the applicant about after the day on which the summons was served, and now swears that she was mistaken. At the hearing her evidence was contradicted by the applicant's father, who swore that his son had gone to America some time before the summons was served. If the evidence were now the same, I would agree with the decision of the justices. Now, however, the applicant himself swears that he was in America when the summons was served, and he is corroborated in that by a letter which is produced written by the applicant from America, and dated there on Mar. 5, and bearing a postmark in America of that date. The service of the summons was on Mar. 13, and if the applicant's story is true we see at once that the finding of the justices was incorrect, for the man was not, on Mar. 13, abiding at his father's house where the summons was served.

I We must, therefore, now consider whether the service of the summons at his father's house in England, which was his last place of abode in England, was a good service. We must consider whether he had a place of abode in America. If he went to America for the purpose only of seeing his brother, with the intention of presently returning to his father's house in England, then he had no place of abode in America; if he went away simply with the intent to avoid service of this summons, meaning to return as soon as the thing had blown over and it was safe to return, then he had no place of abode in America. In such cases it would be correct to say that his last place of abode was his father's house in England. There is, therefore, a question of fact to be determined in this preliminary inquiry as to the service of the summons, and we must undertake that inquiry and determine that question. Upon the materials before us can we safely say that he went abroad simply to avoid service of the summons, or only temporarily? Ought we to infer a dishonest act on his part, when the evidence is equally consistent with honesty? I do not think that there is any sufficient evidence that he went to America to avoid service, or that we can say that he did not go to America in order to live and earn his livelihood there. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that he had a place of abode in America.

Then comes the question, what is the true construction of s. 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, which enacts that:

"After the birth of such bastard child, on the appearance of the person so summoned, or on proof that the summons was duly served on such person, or left at his last place of abode . . . the justices . . . shall hear the evidence . . . and . . . they may adjudge the man to be the putative father of such bastard child. . . ."

Can we say that "left at his last place of abode" means his last place of abode in England, though he has acquired a place of abode abroad? Suppose a case where a man had a place of abode in England, that he left that place of abode and went to live in another part of England, but the people who wished to summon him could not find him although he was living in England. Which place, in that case, would be his "last place of abode"? I think that the place he was last living at would be his last place of abode. In my opinion, the words "last place of abode" mean the place he is actually abiding in, or, if he has no abode at the time when service is to be made, but is wandering about or moving about so as to have no place of abode, the last place at which he was abiding. Does it, then, make any difference if a man has left his place of abode in England and has gone abroad and fixed his place of abode abroad? I think that we cannot read the words of the statute as making any such difference. We must, therefore, inquire whether the applicant's last place of abode was in England or in America. The answer to that inquiry determines this case, and I have already said that he had his last place of abode in America. The service, therefore, of the summons in England at his father's house was not a good service, and the justices had no jurisdiction to hear the summons.

There is a further point raised, which is the one mentioned by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Berkley v. Thompson (4), that, even if the man were only wandering about in America and had no place of abode there, yet he would be abroad and out of the jurisdiction, and that there could, in such case, be no service at his last place of abode in England, because there could not be any personal service abroad. There is, I think, much to be said in favour of that view, but it is not necessary to determine that question here, because the man had his last place of abode abroad.

We must decide that there was no due service of the summons in this case under the statute, and that the justices had, therefore, no jurisdiction to inquire into it, and their order must be brought up to be quashed. We differ from the decision of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in the court below in his application of the principles laid down in Brittain v. Kinnaird (1) and R. v. Bolton (5) to the present case, because he missed the distinction between proceedings to enforce an order of justices and an application for a certiorari to bring up an order of justices to be quashed. This rule must be made absolute.

A LOPES, L.J.—This is an application for a certiorari to bring up an order of justices to be quashed, upon the ground that they had no jurisdiction to make the order because there had been no proper service of the summons upon the appellant. It is to be observed that this is not an application for a certiorari to bring up a decision, after a hearing upon the merits, to be quashed, for, if it were, Brittain v. Kinnaird (1) and R. v. Bolton (5) would apply to and govern it; and B this is the mistake which was made by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., who missed the distinction between those cases and R. v. Evans and Yale (2). As to the former cases there is another observation to be made, that both parties were present at the hearing, whereas in this case only the complainant was present. It appears to me that the present case is on all fours with R. v. Evans and Yale (2) and R. v. Lee (3), which show clearly that the court may inquire into the evidence upon a preliminary point as to the service of the summons, and consider both that evidence and other evidence upon the point. Here the justices decided that the defendant, C the present applicant, was the putative father of the complainant's child; but there was a question as to the due service of the summons as the defendant did not appear. It was said that the summons had been actually served upon the defendant, and the evidence before the justices was sufficient to satisfy them of that, and on that evidence we could not disagree with them. Now, however, there D is further evidence before us which shows that the defendant was not in this country when the summons was served, and, upon the evidence, I believe that to be the fact. That being so, it is clear that the justices were wrong in their decision as to the service of the summons, this evidence not being before them.

It is then said that this service was good, because by s. 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, the justices may make an order "upon proof that the E summons was duly served on such person, or left at his last place of abode," and this summons was left at his last place of abode, namely, his father's house. I do not think that this house was his last place of abode under the circumstances of this case, but I believe that his last place of abode was his brother's house in America. Therefore, in my opinion, the service at his father's house was not F sufficient. The case would be different if he had gone away in order to avoid service of the summons simply, as was said in R. v. Evans and Yale (2) and other cases; but there is no evidence of that being the case here, or that he intended to return to his father's house. The words of the statute, "upon proof that the summons was left at his last place of abode," are not satisfied, and this order was made without jurisdiction.

G KAY, L.J.—This case is not before us upon the merits of the case between the complainant and the defendant, but upon an application for a certiorari to bring up the order of the justices as having been made without jurisdiction. Two questions of very great importance arise, and I, therefore, desire to add my own views upon those questions. The one question is, whether this court has any power to enter- Htain an application for a certiorari in a case like this; and the other whether, if the court has such power, the decision of the justices was right or not. The justices decided, in the absence of the present applicant, that he had been duly served with a bastardy summons, which had been left at his father's house, which was his last place of abode in England. The justices thought, indeed, that he still resided there when the summons was served, upon evidence that was adduced at the hearing of the summons. At this hearing the applicant was neither present I nor represented; but his father, who did not and could not represent him, gave some evidence that he had left England before service of the summons.

The first question is, whether this court can enter upon an inquiry whether the justices were right or wrong in holding that the summons had been duly served. It would be, in my opinion, a very serious matter to hold that an order can be made upon a man behind his back upon an irregular service of a summons, and that he has no power whatever to question it afterwards if it was wrong. Suppose a case in which, upon an absolutely false affidavit of the service of a summons, a magistrate made an order against a man where he was not present. Can it be possible that the defendant would have no power at all to set the matter right and question the decision of the magistrate upon clear proof that the affidavit was false? I do not think so; and there are distinct authorities to the contrary. Brittain v. Kinnaird (1) and R. v. Bolton (5) are clearly different cases, for in those cases both parties were present, and each had an opportunity of showing that the evidence of the other was wrong. In this case the defendant was not present, and was not represented, and had no opportunity of showing what the real facts were. The proceedings were entirely ex parte. If, therefore, the service of the summons was insufficient, I think that it is necessary, as a matter of natural justice, that the defendant should have the right to appeal here, and to show that the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order because there had been no service of the summons upon him. This very point has been expressly decided in R. v. Evans and Yale (2), which was followed in R. v. Lee (3), which show that the defendant has a right to apply for a certiorari to bring up the order to be quashed upon the ground that there had been no service of the summons.

The next question, then, is, whether there was a proper service of the summons or not. Upon the facts now before us it is perfectly clear that there was no service of the summons upon the defendant himself, for he had left England and gone to America some time before the summons was left at his father's house. Under these circumstances, was the service of the summons at his father's house a good service under s. 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872? In my opinion, only one meaning can be given to the words of s. 4 of the Act, "on proof that the summons was left at his last place of abode," and I think that "his last place of abode" means the last place of abode which he had at the time when the summons was served; that is, his actual abode, or, if he had no actual abode, the last place at which he had been abiding. The section does mean his last place of abode in England; but he has not his last place of abode in England if he has a place of abode abroad, and, therefore, if the applicant had a place of abode in America, as I think he had, he had not a last place of abode in England within the meaning of the section. The truth is that when a man has left England and is abiding abroad—that is, has a place of abode abroad—before the service of the summons, he is not amenable to this Act at all. The Act, in s. 3, has a provision to meet such a case, and separately contemplates and deals with the case where a man is out of England and s. 4 is inapplicable. LORD SELBORNE, L.C., expresses that opinion in Berkley v. Thompson (4), where he says, referring to s. 3 of the Act (10 App. Cas. at p. 49):

"It is impossible to read that provision without seeing that this legislation proceeds upon the footing that the presence of the putative father in England is necessary for the jurisdiction to attach."

I think that he there gives the real meaning of the statute, and that service of the summons cannot be made at all where the man is actually residing abroad at the time when the summons purports to be served. This rule must be made absolute to bring up this order to be quashed.

Rule absolute for a certiorari.

Bill of Exchange—Acceptance—General acceptance—Acceptance “in favour of drawer only”—Qualified acceptance—Consideration of words used and situation in which placed—Need for words of qualification to form part of acceptance and indicate clearly restriction meant to be introduced—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 19 (2).

C

A bill of exchange was drawn by F. upon the appellants payable “to order F.” The appellants stamped on the face of the bill: “Accepted payable at A. Bank London.” Above these words they wrote “In favour of F. only, No. 28.” The word “order” was struck out, but it did not appear when or by whom. In an action by the respondents, who were endorsees for value, against the acceptors, the acceptors claimed that they were not liable on the ground that the acceptance was qualified.

Held: (i) in deciding whether the acceptance was qualified, regard should be had both to the words used and to the situation in which they were placed; (ii) words of qualification could only be effective if they were incorporated in the acceptance or at least so connected with the acceptance as obviously to form part of it, and if they indicated plainly and intelligibly (or, per LORD WATSON and LORD HERSCHELL, clearly and unequivocally) the nature of the restriction which they were meant to introduce; and (iii) (LORD BRAMWELL and LORD MORRIS dissenting) applying the above test, the acceptance was general, and the acceptors were liable.

Per LORD HERSCHELL (LORD BRAMWELL and LORD MORRIS disagreeing): No relevance could be attached to the erasure of the word “order.”

Appeal by the defendants, H. Meyer & Co., from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.), reported 25 Q.B.D. 343, reversing a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (CAVE and A. L. SMITH, JJ.), upon a Special Case by which the Queen's Bench Division had held that the defendants were not liable to the plaintiffs, De Croix, Verley et Cie.

I

The action was brought by the endorsees of a bill of exchange against the acceptors, and the question was whether the bill was accepted in such a way as to render it not negotiable. The bill was drawn by one Flipo, in France, addressed to the defendants, H. Meyer & Co., who were merchants in London, and payable to Flipo, and it was accepted by the defendants as follows: “In favour of Mr. L. Delobbel-Flipo only,” which words were in writing, the rest of the acceptance being impressed by a stamp. Flipo endorsed the bill to the plaintiffs, the present respondents, who were bankers in France, and they discounted it and placed the amount less discount, to the credit of Flipo, not noticing that the bill was accepted in any unusual form. On the plaintiffs presenting the bill for payment it was dishonoured on the instructions of the defendants. The Divisional Court held that the acceptance was such as to make the bill not negotiable, and, therefore, that the plaintiffs could not recover, but that decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

The House took time for consideration.

July 30, 1891. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that in this case the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed. The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who are bankers at Lille, against the defendants, a limited company, carrying on business in London, upon a bill drawn by one Flipo, and accepted by the defendants.

The only question is, whether the bill, as accepted, was a negotiable instrument. As to the form which purports to be the acceptance, no one can doubt that it was an ordinary mercantile form accepted and payable at the Alliance Bank with the proper signatures. But the question arises by reason of some words written above that which every mercantile man would look upon as the acceptance, and these words are, "In favour of Mr. L. Delobbel-Flipo only, No. 28." These words are written above what I have called the acceptance, and I think any mercantile man would regard the words I have quoted as something apart from, and not forming any portion of, the acceptance itself. Nor is it easy to construe them as giving any qualification to the acceptance. I think much depends on the exact form, and on an apparently complete acceptance being found in its usual place in the bill. A known mercantile instrument with the word "accepted" printed by a stamp, and in ordinary mercantile form, is sought to be cut down and qualified by some words written, it is true, on the same piece of paper, and above the acceptance, but which to my mind, even now that I have heard the argument, convey no particular meaning. I am not certain that I understand what is the true meaning of the words treated as separate writing "in favour of Mr. L. Delobbel-Flipo only." The form of the instrument, so far as the ordinary mercantile language is concerned, is quite intelligible. The bill is accepted, payable at a particular bank. It is suggested in the argument that it was intended that these words should tell the holder of the bill that it was only payable to the drawer himself. I am not certain that I can even now gather the meaning of the words themselves, but I am quite certain that any ordinary mercantile man, looking at the stamped acceptance in ordinary form and stamped across the bill, would assume that it was a clean acceptance, and that the words written above it, whatever the meaning they might convey to the immediate parties, would certainly not convey anything which would qualify or cut them down to a person who had nothing before him but the bill itself.

I am happy to think that the decision in this case involves nothing more than the proposition that, if a person writes across a bill that which unqualified would, in ordinary course, import a clean acceptance of a bill, and intends to qualify its operation, he must do so by plain and intelligible language, and make that qualification sufficiently part of the acceptance itself to be intelligible in the ordinary course of business. If any other principle were laid down I think it would be fatal to the convenience of trade and the conduct of mercantile affairs, which demand for their transaction convenient and compendious forms, to which the law merchant has attached a definite meaning. Such ambiguous and inappropriate language as is sought to be made here a qualification of an ordinary mercantile instrument would defeat the very object which mercantile instruments are intended to effect. I move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

- A LORD WATSON.—A bill of exchange for £778 4s. 2d. was drawn in France by one L. Delobbel-Flipo, in favour of himself as payee, and was accepted by the appellants in London, payable there at the Alliance Bank. When the bill matured, the appellants refused to make payment to the respondents, who are endorsees for value, upon the ground that, by the special terms of their acceptance, its contents were payable to Flipo only. In this action, which has been brought by the respondents, the law of France is not pleaded by either party. The issue between them is raised by a Special Case, the fifth article of which states :

"It is not suggested that there is any custom upon which the defendants can rely, by which the addition of the words, 'in favour of L. Delobbel-Flipo only' restricts the negotiability of the bill. The defendants rely solely on the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882."

- C Section 19 (2) of that statute enacts that "a qualified acceptance in express terms varies the effect of the bill as drawn." In order to produce that effect, the words of qualification must, in my opinion, be incorporated in the acceptance, or at least so connected with the acceptance as obviously to form part of it; and must also be such as to indicate clearly and unequivocally the nature of the restriction which they are meant to introduce.

- D There is a clean acceptance by the appellants stamped in printed letters across the face of the bill; above that acceptance, on separate lines, and forming a separate paragraph, appear the words "In favour of Mr. L. Delobbel-Flipo only. No. 28." These words and figures are in writing, with the exception of the word "No." which is stamped. In the position which they occupy I do not think the words "in favour of Mr. L. Delobbel-Flipo only" can be regarded as part of the acceptance, or have the effect of qualifying its terms; they are not inserted in it, and are not grammatically connected with it, but occur as a preface to "No. 28," which forms no part of the acceptance. "No. 28" is a memorandum for the purposes of accounts kept between the acceptors and the drawers, or between the former and their bankers, and therefore relates to matters with which holders of the bill, or persons acquiring right to it, have no concern. In my opinion the preface would naturally be regarded as an integral part of that memorandum, having no reference to the terms of the acceptance, and would not convey any intimation that the acceptance was meant to be restricted. I am accordingly of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

- G LORD BRAMWELL.—I consider what was written and printed by the defendants on the face of the bill as one—one thing only, an acceptance and no more—not an acceptance and something else. That being so, I am unable to see any difference between "in favour of Flipo only. accepted payable," &c., and "accepted in favour of Flipo only, payable," &c. I do not know where the body of the acceptance begins, unless at the beginning of what is written. It is said that "in favour of Flipo only" does not necessarily mean the same as "accepted in favour of Flipo only." I think it does, but, if not necessarily, what does it naturally mean, especially when it is remembered that the word "order" was erased? That was no doubt unauthorised, if done by the drawees, but it clearly shows the intention of the drawees if done by them, and the knowledge by the drawer of that intention if done by him. The striking out of "order" was not a memorandum for the use of the drawee. I cannot find that any other cause for what was done can be suggested.

As to the thing being clear and unequivocal, I begin to doubt if there is such a thing, but it is enough if words are intelligible. Can there be a doubt that this bill might have been protested for non-acceptance according to its tenour? I suppose from the form of the acceptance that the appellants thought they had, or might have, some cross-claim against Flipo; Flipo, probably, was glad to get anything from them, and so put up with the acceptance, and perhaps endorsed it in satisfaction of a bad debt to those glad to get anything from him. I think the judgment should be reversed. A

LORD HERSCHELL.—The respondents in this case seek to recover from the appellants the amount of a bill of exchange accepted by them. The defence set up is, that the acceptance was a qualified one, and restricted the right to require payment to the payee alone, and that the acceptors are, therefore, under no obligation to the respondents who took by endorsement from him. B

It was not disputed at the Bar that the acceptor of a bill of exchange may make his acceptance a qualified one. If he do so the drawer may, of course, refuse to take such an acceptance, and treat the bill as dishonoured; but, if he takes the bill, the obligation of the acceptor is not absolute, but subject to the qualification which he has introduced. I think further that it is beyond dispute that, if an acceptor seeks to qualify his acceptance, and thus to modify the obligations which an acceptance ordinarily imposes, he must do so on the face of the bill in clear and unequivocal terms, and in such a manner that any person taking the bill, if he acted reasonably, could not fail to understand that it was accepted subject to an expressed qualification. C

About these propositions I do not think there can be any difference of opinion; the difficulty lies in applying them to the facts of the particular case. The bill in question was drawn in France by a person named Delobbel-Flipo upon the appellants, and forwarded to London for their acceptance. The bill is drawn on a printed form containing the word "order" immediately following the name of Delobbel-Flipo, which has been inserted as the payee of the bill. This word "order" has been erased, but it does not appear by whom, nor do I think it material. If, as suggested, it was done by the acceptors, they were not justified in making the erasure, and in any case there would be nothing to show a person taking the bill that the word had not been struck out by the drawer at the time he inserted the name of the payee. I do not think, therefore, that the erasure of the word "order" can in any way assist the contention that the acceptance was a qualified one. That must be determined by a consideration of the effect of the words written across the bill by the acceptors. D

For the purpose of accepting the bill the appellant company impressed upon it by means of a stamp the words "accepted payable at the Alliance Bank," underneath which the signatures of two directors and the secretary were written. The acceptors wrote across the bill above the word "accepted" the words "in favour of M. L. Delobbel-Flipo only"; between these words and the word "accepted" was written "No. 28." In considering whether the effect of the words "in favour of M. L. Delobbel-Flipo only" was to make the acceptance a qualified one in the manner suggested, regard must be had both to the words used and to the situation in which they are placed. It may be that, if the same words had been found in the body of the acceptance following the word "accepted," they would have amounted to the qualification contended for. The presence of any words in the body of the acceptance would of itself suggest the idea that some qualification of it was intended; but where the words are not inserted in the body of the acceptance, I do not think the same impression is likely to be produced, though the words may, of course, be so clearly intended to qualify the acceptance and so incapable of any other reasonable construction that they would be as effectual for the purpose. But in the present case the words written above the acceptance are not "payable to Delobbel-Flipo only," which is the meaning sought to be attached to them, but "in favour of Delobbel-Flipo only," which do not seem to me necessarily to bear the same meaning. The words "in favour of," when used in relation to a bill of exchange, do not ordinarily mean that it is payable only to the person in whose favour it is said to be drawn; the words are equally applied when the bill is made payable to his order. The words "in favour of," therefore, are properly paraphrased by "payable to, or to the order of"; but then it is that the insertion of the E

A word "only" after Flipo's name would show that this could not be the meaning intended. It must be remembered, however, that between these words and the acceptance "No. 28" was inserted, which separates the words which it is suggested qualify the acceptance from the acceptance itself.

Under these circumstances I do not think that it is impossible that a person taking the acceptance by way of endorsement might suppose that the words "in favour of Delobbel-Flipo only" were like the "No. 28," a mere memorandum inserted by a party to the bill, and not intended to affect the acceptance. It might be supposed to indicate that it was the 28th bill, or No. 28 of the bills accepted "in favour of Delobbel-Flipo only" as distinguished from bills, accepted in favour of Flipo and some other persons. I do not say that this would be the interpretation given to it by a person who carefully and critically considered it, but that is not the question. It is impossible, as I have said, to dissociate the words used from the position and collocation in which they are found, and if these be such as to suggest that the words are a mere memorandum, a person taking the bill, even if he exercised the ordinary care to be expected in such transactions, would not be likely to examine or weigh them with the same care as if they were found in the body of the acceptance. In my opinion the qualification was not made in clear and unequivocal terms, and in such a manner that any person taking the bill if he acted reasonably could not fail to understand that it was accepted subject to that qualification. I think, therefore, the judgment ought to be affirmed.

LORD MORRIS. The respondents are French bankers, and sue the appellants, who are a limited company carrying on business in London, to recover the amount due on foot of a bill of exchange for £778 4s. 2d., dated Sept. 12, 1889, drawn by one L. Delobbel-Flipo, accepted by the appellants, and endorsed by Flipo to the respondents, who discounted it for Flipo. I assume that when drawn by Flipo, and when sent by him for acceptance, it contained in the body of the bill the word "order"; but that before accepting the bill the appellants struck out the word "order," the effect of which was that the bill would, except for the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 8 (4), be a bill payable to Flipo only, and would not be transferable. The appellants state that the bill was so altered in the body by them when accepting, and it was not controverted by the respondents. I attach some importance to this, as an erasure of the word "order" in the body of the bill ought to have attracted the attention of the respondents, and made them scan the acceptance carefully. It is stated that the respondents do not understand the English language, and that their attention was not called to the form of the acceptance till after the dishonour of the bill; but their ignorance of English cannot avoid the natural and reasonable effect of the acceptance. The Queen's Bench Division held that the bill was not negotiable. I concur in that judgment, and in that of LORD BRAMWELL. I read the words "In favour of Mr. L. Delobbel-Flipo only" as indicating an intention that the bill should not be transferable within the meaning of s. 8 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, as equivalent to the words "payable to L. Delobbel-Flipo only"; and I do not attribute any importance to the insertion of "No. 28" between the words qualifying the acceptance and the stamped acceptance. It is not adverted to in any of the judgments of the Court of Appeal: it was most probably the number of bills that had been then accepted.

But it is said that the qualified acceptance should be plain and intelligible, and that, of course, there are several modes of expressing the qualification of the acceptance upon which no question could arise. That is so; but it does not solve the question here, whether in the present case the acceptance fairly and intelligibly indicated, not to a person who could not read it, but to anyone who could, that the acceptance was a qualified one. The qualifying words "In favour of L. Delobbel-Flipo only" immediately precede, are connected with and control the stamped acceptance which follows. They should have attracted the respondents' attention, when they would have observed the form of the acceptance, that is the qualifying form of the acceptance. The respondents ought to have observed it, and, if they had, they would have read the terms upon which the appellants had affixed their stamped acceptance.

Appeal by the husband from a decision of JEUNE, J.

- C The husband petitioned for judicial separation on the ground of the cruelty of his wife. She, by her answer, denied the cruelty alleged, and charged the husband with cruelty and violence, and asked for a judicial separation on that account. The action was tried on June 12, 1890, and a decree of judicial separation was pronounced on the husband's petition, the custody of the three elder children being given to the father and the custody of the youngest to the mother. On June 18, 1890, an agreement was made between the husband and wife, whereby the husband agreed to pay the wife £2 per week by way of alimony, having regard to his then means and position, and it was expressly stipulated that the agreement should not act as an estoppel, or in any way operate to the prejudice of either party in any application either of them might make for a variation of the amount of the allowance. In the latter part of 1890, the husband came into a considerable estate, and on June 6, 1891, the wife filed a petition asking for an allotment by way of permanent alimony. The husband filed an answer admitting a net income amounting to £1,244, or thereabouts. The wife applied by summons for further particulars of the husband's property, income and outgoings, and the summons was referred to the registrar, who fixed July 30, 1891, to hear the parties. On July 18, 1891, the husband took out a summons to dismiss the petition for alimony, on the ground
- E that the court had no jurisdiction to decree permanent alimony to the wife under the circumstances. The registrar dismissed the petition. The wife appealed to JEUNE, J., who allowed the appeal, and directed the question of allowance to be referred back to the registrar. The husband now appealed from that decision.

Priestley for the wife.

- Nov. 6, 1891. KAY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court.—The question on this appeal is as to the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court to grant permanent alimony to the wife after a decree for judicial separation on account of the cruelty of the wife. If the decree had been founded on misconduct of the husband, it is conceded that such a grant could have been made. It would be strange if there were jurisdiction in the one case and not in the other. It may not have been customary to grant it to a wife who was at fault, but to say that there is no jurisdiction to do so seems unreasonable. A case was put during the argument by BOWEN, L.J., of a husband who, by the marriage settlement, was entitled during his life to all the income of the wife's property. Can it possibly be the law that the wife must be left totally unprovided for under such circumstances because the court has no jurisdiction to make a provision for her even out of that which before the marriage was her own property? The question depends on the several statutes under which the present Divorce Court was founded. But in construing them, regard must be had to the jurisdiction existing before they were passed. Unless there is something in them expressly taking away powers before exercised by the ecclesiastical courts, we should be reluctant to hold that the Divorce Court has a more limited authority than they had.
- H
- I

In the first Act, by which the Divorce Court is constituted (the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 22), it is provided that A

“In all suits and proceedings other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage, the said courts shall proceed and act and give relief on principles and rules which in the opinion of the said court shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts have heretofore acted and given relief, but subject to the provisions herein contained and to the rules and orders under this Act.” B

LORD PENZANCE decided, in Covell v. Covell (3), that the Divorce Court could, after a decree for judicial separation, entertain a petition for alimony, and he founded his judgment on the previous practice in that respect of the ecclesiastical courts in cases of divorce a mensa et thoro, citing Cooke v. Cooke (4) as a case in which this was done. There seems to be no decision that this might not have been done by the ecclesiastical courts when the separation was decreed on account of the misconduct of the wife. In the text-books and digests, there are mentioned two cases of applications to the ecclesiastical court for divorce a mensa et thoro on account of the cruelty of the wife—Kirkman v. Kirkman (5) and Furlonger v. Furlonger (6). These are referred to by counsel in White v. White (1) as the only reported cases. But it seems always to have been competent for the husband to obtain a divorce a mensa et thoro on this ground: Waring v. Waring (7). In one of these cases, the divorce was granted, but there was not any application for alimony. The granting or refusing of alimony after a divorce a mensa et thoro seems to have been a matter on which the ecclesiastical courts exercised a large discretion. It appears to have been their practice not to grant alimony to a wife divorced a mensa et thoro on the ground of her adultery, but no doubt is thrown on the jurisdiction of the court to do so: see White v. White (1). In applications to Parliament for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, it was usual to insert in the Bill a provision for permanent alimony to the wife, although the divorce was sought on the ground of her adultery, and such alimony, it is said, was usually granted when the wife brought a fortune to the husband: MACQUEEN'S PRACTICE OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS at p. 537. C

Under the new law, three cases have occurred. In White v. White (1) and Dart v. Dart (2), alimony was refused, and in the latter the Judge Ordinary expressed his opinion that he had no jurisdiction to grant alimony in such a case. However, in Prichard v. Prichard (8), the Judge Ordinary refused to follow those decisions and granted alimony, saying that, if there were no precedent, he ought to make one. G

The argument against the jurisdiction was not founded on any words in the statute expressly negating it. There are no such words. It was rested chiefly on s. 17 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which provides that application for judicial separation may be made by either husband or wife, and the court may decree judicial separation accordingly, H

“and where the application is by the wife may make any order for alimony which shall be deemed just.”

That seems to contemplate an order for alimony in the decree itself, when such decree was made on the wife's application. In such a case, all the facts would probably be before the court at the original hearing, whereas, if the decree was on the suit of the husband, the wife must make a separate application for alimony, which the husband would not be likely to make for her. It would be giving extraordinary and unnatural force to the language of s. 17 to say that it takes away or even negatives the jurisdiction of the court to grant alimony where the decree for separation is made at the suit of the husband, and, in our opinion, that is not the true effect of the provision. Section 32, which refers to alimony, and prescribes the mode of granting it, has been treated as referring to a decree for dissolution of marriage only: see per LORD PENZANCE in Covell v. Covell (3). Jurisdiction to I

A make such a decree was given for the first time by the statute, and it was necessary to give jurisdiction also to grant alimony in such cases, and that may have been the sole object of this section. But this would leave unaffected the power of granting alimony in a case of judicial separation if the ecclesiastical courts had such power.

B On the whole, we see no reason to doubt that the ecclesiastical courts had jurisdiction to grant permanent alimony in a case like the present, and we cannot construe the recent Divorce Act as depriving the Divorce Court of a like jurisdiction. Our opinion, therefore, is that the Divorce Court has jurisdiction in this case to grant permanent alimony if it shall see fit to do so. Whether it will be proper to make such a grant is not now to be determined, as the reference on the subject is general, and has to be considered before that can be decided. The appeal
C must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal by the official receiver, as trustee in bankruptcy, from an order of NORTH, J., refusing an application to vary the chief clerk's certificate. D

In November, 1892, S. Hannington obtained a final judgment against W. H. O'Shea in respect of goods sold and delivered, and costs. Not being able to obtain payment of the amount he presented a bankruptcy petition against O'Shea, which was dismissed on April 21, 1893, on the understanding that other petitions then pending against O'Shea in London were also dismissed, and that payment of the judgment debt was made in certain instalments. The London petitions, presented at the date of the dismissal of Hannington's petition, were dismissed in May, 1893. The arrangement for settlement of the judgment debt having fallen through, and there being a fund in court belonging to O'Shea, on June 1, 1893, on the application of Hannington, a charging order nisi was made ex parte by NORTH, J.'s chief clerk, and a date fixed for O'Shea to show cause against the same being made absolute. O'Shea having filed evidence in opposition, the chief clerk declined to grant the charging order absolute. The matter was referred to the judge, and, on July 17, 1893, the order absolute was made. On Aug. 4, 1893, the action of Re O'Shea, Courage v. O'Shea, came before NORTH, J., on further consideration, when an inquiry was directed, among others, as to what was due to various creditors on the fund in court (including Hannington) for costs incurred in respect of their securities, and also as to the priority of the various creditors. The inquiry was founded on the chief clerk's certificate, dated Aug. 3, 1893, which included Hannington as a creditor on the fund. On Dec. 13, 1893, a receiving order was made against O'Shea on a petition which had been presented by one Moore, on May 30, 1893. E F G

The official receiver applied by summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate by discharging the finding that the charging order obtained by Hannington was a valid encumbrance on the fund in court. NORTH, J., dismissed the summons on the ground that it had not been shown that, when Hannington obtained the charging order, he had notice of the act of bankruptcy alleged to have been committed by O'Shea. He was, further, not satisfied that the alleged act of bankruptcy had been committed. The official receiver appealed. H

By s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: I

"Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act with respect to the effect of bankruptcy on an execution or attachment, and with respect to the avoidance of certain settlements and preferences, nothing in this Act shall invalidate, in the case of a bankruptcy— . . . (d) Any contract, dealing, or transaction by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration, provided that both the following conditions are complied with, namely—(1) The payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, as the case may be,

A takes place before the date of the receiving order; and (2) The person (other than the debtor) to, by, or with whom the payment . . . was made, executed, or entered into, has not at the time of the payment . . . notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time."

C LORD HALSBURY.—I think that we are all agreed with counsel for the official receiver as to the construction of s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that this charging order is not a protected transaction, but is really more in the nature of an execution. But that will not suit the creditor's case. Looking at the language of the section, it is impossible, to my mind, to give any other interpretation to the word "transaction." I agree with the view taken by MELLISH, L.J., in Re Wright, Ex parte Arnold (1). It seems to me that a "dealing" is very much the same thing when you look at the words with which the term "transaction" is accompanied. I cannot overlook that the general idea founded by the legislature was D that what they are really protecting by that section are bona fide dealings with the bankrupt as a trader, which, having been completed before notice of the act of bankruptcy, ought to be protected. That being the condition of things, I think that counsel for the official receiver's point is a good one, and that the answer to it is insufficient.

E It becomes unnecessary, therefore, to enter into the other question at all, because that depends on a comparison of all the affidavits, and I am not prepared to say that my mind is fully made up as to what decision I should arrive at if that was the question which I had to determine. We are now in this position, that we have not before us the same question which was argued before NORTH, J.
We are sitting in appeal on a totally different point from that which was raised F before him. Furthermore, I have this observation to make, that every part of this transaction seems to me to be tainted with irregularity or error. This is not a motion to vary the chief clerk's certificate at all. The chief clerk's certificate is perfectly right. It seems to me that it ought to have been an application to make an order notwithstanding the chief clerk's certificate. The result is that I think that the Official Receiver must succeed, but that he must be satisfied with not receiving any costs, for we will not give any costs of this appeal.

G LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The substantial question is whether a charging order obtained against a fund in court belonging to the judgment debtor under the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 14, falls either within s. 45 or s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and is valid as against the official receiver acting as the trustee in bankruptcy of the judgment debtor, whose title to the fund H relates back to a time anterior to the charging order. Unless the charging order is protected under one or other of those two sections, it is not protected at all as against the official receiver's title relating back to a time anterior to it. Therefore, the question which we have to consider is whether it is either a "protected execution" within s. 45 or a "protected transaction" within s. 49.

I Section 45 is so worded as to exclude the possibility of holding that this is a protected execution within that section. Counsel for the creditor admits that, and has very properly not argued it. Therefore, we may disregard s. 45. But, although we need not consider s. 45, it will not do to lose sight of the real nature of the charging order, which is much more akin to an execution than what is commonly called a "dealing or transaction." It must not be forgotten that a charging order is obtained in the first instance ex parte. The practice is to get an order nisi, and then to give notice to the debtor. All the subsequent proceedings are, no doubt, done on notice to the debtor. That being the nature of the step taken in the present case, I cannot think that it is fairly construing the expression A "contract, dealing, or transaction," in s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to hold that a step taken behind the back of a debtor and without his sanction, and in which he takes no part whatever, is a "contract, dealing, or transaction by or with" him. I think that that would be stretching the words too far. I do not think that this is a novel decision at all, having regard to Re Curtoys, Ex parte Pillers (2), in which it was held that a charging order was not a dealing under the B previous Bankruptcy Act, 1869, because it was a step in invitum, and not in any fair sense a contract or dealing. In substance and in principle that decision covers the present case. Section 4 of the Act of 1883, re-enacting the language of s. 94 of the Act of 1869, has had put into it the word "transaction" after "dealing."

 I for one very much doubt whether anything has been gained by that. "Contract, dealing, or transaction by or with the bankrupt" means something done—some- C thing in which the bankrupt would not be put in the same position as he is in the case of a charging order. I think that it would be straining the language of s. 14 of the Judgments Act, 1838, which says that a man who has a charging order is to have the like remedies as a person would have if he had an agreement of charge, if we were to hold that he was to be deemed a person in whose favour such an agreement has been made. I think that we should be straining the language, D and, the case not being within s. 49, the opposition to this appeal fails. As regards the question of notice we need not go into it.

I am not at all satisfied that the doctrine of Lucas v. Dicker (3) could be stretched so far as counsel for the official receiver is asking us to stretch it here, for this reason amongst others, that all the petitions were dismissed. I doubt very much whether Lucas v. Dicker (3) and Re Sedgwick, Ex parte Hobbs (4) E can be pressed so far as to say that a man who has notice that a bankruptcy petition has been dismissed has notice that an act of bankruptcy has been committed by the debtor. I say no more about that, as it is unnecessary for the determination of the present case.

As regards the costs, the summons is all wrong. The certificate was perfectly right when it was made. Here is a creditor who has a charge on the fund in F court, and his priority is quite right; but, by reason of the bankruptcy of the judgment debtor, his charge is invalid as against the official receiver acting as trustee in bankruptcy. The proper form of the application would have been an application to the court, notwithstanding the chief clerk's certificate, that the money should not be paid out to the judgment creditor, but should be paid out to the official receiver. Having regard, therefore, to the fact that the proceedings are G all wrong in form, and having regard also to the fact that this point was never taken before NORTH, J., and further affidavits having been filed on the subject, I do not think that it would be right to give the official receiver any costs. I think that the case must be treated as fought out on the merits, and that there ought to be an expression of opinion of this court that that charging order is invalid as against the official receiver acting as the trustee in bankruptcy. That would put H the matter right. But I do not think that he should be allowed any costs of the appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This case comes before this court in a peculiar way. The point argued before NORTH, J., on which he gave judgment, has been practically abandoned. NORTH, J., gave judgment on the hypothesis that the only evidence I and knowledge of an act of bankruptcy was the knowledge of the petition, which itself would contain a statement of the act of bankruptcy which was subsequently dismissed. The learned judge said that he was not quite satisfied on the evidence that any act of bankruptcy had ever been committed at all. Therefore, he gave judgment against the official receiver. Thereupon the official receiver appeals, and the first thing that he does is not to controvert the judgment of NORTH, J., but begins with another affidavit of Captain O'Shea for the purpose of showing, what he had not deposed in his former affidavit, that there was an act of bankruptcy de

A fact on April 7. So he begins with a new statement of facts in this court. Further, counsel for the official receiver takes a point of law, which nobody took on behalf of the official receiver when before NORTH, J., viz., that the charging order is not protected because of either s. 45 or s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Section 45 of the Act of 1883 is abandoned. The present case is not within that section. But it is said that it is not a transaction protected within s. 49. On that point of law, for the reasons which have been given by LORD HALSBURY and LINDLEY, L.J., the official receiver succeeds. He has, however, brought up an entirely new case, which I do not think NORTH, J., would have recognised if he had been sitting here. Having brought up a new case of facts and law he gets a judgment. But what is right to be done as to costs? I think that the least to be done is not to let him have his costs of the appeal; and, therefore, he gets judgment without costs.

Re FRASER. Ex parte CENTRAL BANK OF LONDON

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.), August 5, 1892]

[Reported [1892] 2 Q.B. 633; 67 L.T. 401; 36 Sol. Jo. 714;
9 Morr. 256]

Bankruptcy—Petition—Hearing—Petition based on judgment debt—Jurisdiction of court to go behind the judgment.

Partnership—Holding out as partner—Retirement of partner—Debt incurred by firm—Judgment obtained against existing and retired partners—Proper steps taken to notify retirement—No evidence of holding out to creditors.

J. F., a partner in the firm of J. and W. F., retired, the bankers and principal customers of the firm being notified of that fact. J. F. consented to the firm continuing under its existing name. The firm incurred a debt by accepting a bill. The creditors, who had not previously dealt with the firm and had no knowledge of the dissolution of the partnership, obtained judgment under Ord. 14 for the debt against both J. F. and W. F. J. F. did not appear at the hearing of the summons, and an application by him to set aside the judgment was refused. A bankruptcy notice having been served on him by the creditors and a bankruptcy petition presented against him for non-compliance with the notice,

Held: (i) the Bankruptcy Court had power to go behind the judgment and inquire into the liabilities upon which it was founded; (ii) as J. F. had taken proper steps to notify his retirement and there was no evidence that he had held himself out to the creditors to be a partner, he had not made himself liable for the debt; and, therefore, the petition should be dismissed.

Per LORD ESHER, M.R.: The doctrine of "holding out" is a branch of the doctrine of estoppel, and its effect is that, if a man holds himself out to be a partner and makes a man act upon that supposition, he cannot afterwards say that he is not a partner. Estoppel can only be relied on by a person towards whom some act has been done or to whom some statement has been made when he has acted upon the faith of such act or statement.

Appeal by the Central Bank of London from an order of Mr. Registrar HOPE dismissing their petition for a receiving order against J. Fraser.

J. Fraser had been a partner in the firm of J. and W. Fraser. Upon his retirement the bankers and principal customers of the firm were notified. He consented to the firm continuing under its existing name and it accepted a bill of exchange. The creditors, the Central Bank of London, had not previously dealt with the firm. An action was brought by them against the firm of J. and W. Fraser upon one bill of exchange. Judgment was obtained, under Ord. 14, against both J. and W. Fraser, J. Fraser not appearing upon the hearing of the summons for judgment. J. Fraser subsequently applied to have the judgment against him set aside, and for leave to defend the action, upon the ground that he had ceased to be a partner when the bill of exchange was accepted. The master, judge, Divisional Court, and Court of Appeal all refused to set aside the judgment.

The Central Bank of London issued a bankruptcy notice against J. Fraser in respect of this judgment, and presented a petition in bankruptcy against him founded on non-compliance with that notice. Upon the hearing of the petition, Mr. Registrar HOPE, after hearing evidence, decided that J. Fraser had ceased to be a partner at the time when the bill of exchange had been accepted, and that he was not liable thereon, or for the debt in respect of which the judgment had been obtained. Notice had been given of the dissolution to the bankers and principal customers of the firm, but the dissolution had not been advertised, the petitioning creditors had not previously dealt with the firm, and did not know of the dissolution. W. Fraser had continued the business under the title of J. and W. Fraser. The registrar dismissed the petition. The petitioning creditors appealed.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provided:

"Section 7 (3). If the court is not satisfied with the proof of the petitioning creditor's debt, or of the act of bankruptcy, or of the service of the petition, or is satisfied by the debtor that he is able to pay his debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may dismiss the petition."

Hopkinson, Q.C., for the petitioning creditors.
Mellor for J. Fraser.

A LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the petitioning creditors applied to the Bankruptcy Court to make a receiving order against J. Fraser, and the registrar decided not to make the order. Thereupon this appeal is brought. The petitioning creditors had obtained a judgment against the alleged debtor, that judgment being against him as one of the partners in a firm of J. and W. Fraser. That judgment was obtained under Ord. 14 upon admissions by W. Fraser. J. Fraser had applied B to have that judgment, obtained under Ord. 14, set aside as against him, and for leave to defend the action. Upon that application the matter was in the discretion of the court, and the court declined to set aside the judgment upon many grounds, one of the grounds being the delay in making the application.

This judgment, therefore, at law stands good, and cannot now be questioned by J. Fraser in any court but the Bankruptcy Court. When, however, the attempt is C made to use this judgment in the Bankruptcy Court in order to make J. Fraser a bankrupt, the Bankruptcy Court has to exercise the discretion which has been given to it. This duty is imposed upon the Bankruptcy Court by s. 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The question, then, is whether the registrar had not, under s. 7, power to refuse this receiving order, and rightly exercised his discretion. The mere fact that there was a judgment at law does not prevent the registrar D from inquiring whether there was or was not a good judgment debt. The Court of Bankruptcy can go behind a judgment debt and can inquire into the liabilities upon which the judgment was founded. The Bankruptcy Court does not set aside the judgment, but goes round it; it has jurisdiction to inquire into the subject-matter upon which it is founded.

It has been argued that, under s. 4 (1) (g), the judgment is the foundation of the E bankruptcy notice; but, when we look at s. 7, it is clear that the court may see that there is no good cause for making a receiving order in spite of the judgment; that is settled by Re Lennox, Ex parte Lennox (1). In that case it was decided that, when there is a judgment against a defendant which he cannot set aside, he may ask the Court of Bankruptcy to go behind the judgment, although he cannot get it set aside, and to refuse to make a receiving order. That rule has been based F upon the highest ground, namely, that in the Court of Bankruptcy the court is not dealing only between the debtor and the judgment creditor, but in a manner which affects all the creditors, and it has been said that the court ought not to exercise the tremendous power which it possesses unless it is satisfied that there is a good petitioning creditor's debt after it has gone behind the judgment.

Then, has the registrar in this case exercised that part of his duty properly? or G ought he to have exercised his great powers by making this man a bankrupt? The question is, whether there was a good petitioning creditor's debt due from J. Fraser under the judgment against him. The facts relating to that question have to be dealt with by the registrar. In this case the petitioning creditors took a bill of exchange accepted by the firm of J. and W. Fraser. If J. Fraser was at that time a member of the firm, there was a good debt due from him; if he was H not then a member of the firm, then he was not liable, because it was not his promise to pay. The registrar, when the matter was before him, upon hearing evidence and seeing the witnesses, decided that there was then no partnership, the partnership having been dissolved before the bill was accepted. It was, therefore, proved that this was not the acceptance of J. Fraser.

I It was urged that J. Fraser was liable because he had held himself out to be a partner. The doctrine of "holding out" is a branch of the doctrine of estoppel, and its effect is that, if a man holds himself out to be a partner and makes a man act upon that supposition, he cannot afterwards say that he is not a partner. Estoppel can only be relied upon by a person towards whom some act has been done or to whom some statement has been made, when he has acted upon the faith of such act or statement. There is no evidence whatever that J. Fraser held himself out as a partner to the appellants, and they had never dealt with the firm before.

It is then said that this is res judicata. The question previously adjudicated upon was whether this judgment should be set aside as a judgment. The present question is not that at all, but is whether, the judgment standing good at law, it is the proper subject-matter of a bankruptcy petition. That is not the same question. This appeal fails, and must be dismissed. A

BOWEN, L.J. I am of the same opinion. B

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In no case in the Court of Bankruptcy is a judgment conclusive as to the petitioning creditor's debt. As long ago as 1813, in Ex parte Bryant (2), it was stated by LORD ELDON (1 Ves. & B. at p. 214) that, C

“proof upon a judgment will not stand merely upon that, if there is not a debt due in truth and reality; for which the consideration must be looked at.” D

As to the argument that the matter is res judicata because there had been an attempt to get this judgment set aside which had failed, I cannot see how the matter is on that account any the more res judicata than if no such application had been made. E

Then it is said that there was a holding out of himself as a partner by J. Fraser. I think that it was clearly proved that, when the acceptance was given, J. Fraser was not, in fact, a partner with W. Fraser. He had been a partner, but the partnership had been dissolved, and W. Fraser carried on the business. These particular creditors had not dealt with the firm before the dissolution. Does, then, the permission given by J. Fraser to W. Fraser to carry on the business in the old name amount to the holding out of himself as a partner by J. Fraser? According to Newsome v. Coles (3) a man does not continue liable as a partner if he has taken the proper steps to notify his retirement. That case is not precisely the same as the present case, because, in that case, there was an advertisement of the dissolution. F

The principle, however, is the same, because here there had been a notification to the bankers and principal customers of the firm of the dissolution. I think, therefore, that the facts of this case bring it entirely within the principle of Newsome v. Coles (3), and, that there was no holding out of himself as a partner by J. Fraser, either by words or conduct, which can estop him from saying that he was not a partner. As J. Fraser was not in fact a partner when the acceptance was given, he ought not to be treated in the Bankruptcy Court as a debtor against whom a receiving order should be made. This appeal must be dismissed. G

Limitation of Action—Accrual of action—Loan—Lender entitled to call in whole loan on default of borrower paying quarter's interest for 21 days—Accrual of action to recover principal and interest at end of 21 days.

By an agreement in writing, under which the plaintiff lent a sum of money to the defendant, the defendant agreed to pay interest quarterly, and the plaintiff agreed not to call in the money for five years if the defendant should regularly pay the interest. It was further provided that if the defendant should make default in the payment of any quarterly payment of interest for twenty-one days, the plaintiff might immediately call in the principal. Nothing was ever paid by the defendant on account of interest or principal. Within six years from the end of the term of five years the plaintiff commenced this action to recover the principal and also the interest due thereon for the period within six years before the date of the issue of the writ.

Held: the cause of action arose at the expiration of twenty-one days from the date when the first instalment of interest became due, which was the earliest time at which the plaintiff could have brought the action, and, therefore, the plaintiff's claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Appeal by the plaintiff, Mrs. Harriett Elizabeth Reeves, from a decision of the Divisional Court (DAY and LAWRENCE, JJ.), holding that her claim against the defendant, Sarah Ann Butcher, for the recovery of money lent with interest was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The action was commenced on Feb. 13, 1891, to recover a principal sum of £425 18s., with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, which the plaintiff alleged was due to her from the defendant under an agreement in writing dated April 25, 1880. The defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations, 1623, s. 3, as a bar to the claim both for principal and interest. The plaintiff, in reply, gave up any claim for interest accrued due prior to Feb. 13, 1885.

By the agreement, after reciting that the defendant had applied to the plaintiff to lend her the sum of £425 18s. for a term of five years (subject to the power to call in the same at an earlier period in the events thereafter mentioned) upon her personal security, which the plaintiff had agreed to do upon the defendant executing the now stated agreement, the defendant agreed with the plaintiff that the defendant would pay to the plaintiff interest on the said sum of £425 18s. from the date of the agreement at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, by equal quarterly payments. And the plaintiff thereby agreed with the defendant not to call in the said principal sum or any part thereof during the term of five years from the date of the agreement, if the defendant should so long live, and should duly and regularly pay the said interest. Provided always, that in case the defendant should die before the expiration of the said term, it should be lawful for the plaintiff to call in the said principal sum upon giving to the executors or administrators of the defendant six calendar months' previous notice in writing of her intention so to do; provided also, that in case the defendant should make default in payment of any quarterly payment of interest as aforesaid for the period of twenty-one days next after the same should become payable, it should be lawful for the plaintiff immediately upon the expiration of such twenty-one days to call in and demand payment of the said principal sum and all interest then owing or accruing in respect thereof. No payment in respect of principal or interest had ever been made by the defendant.

The plaintiff brought this action within six years after the expiry of the term of five years mentioned in the agreement, to recover the principal and also the interest for the six years immediately prior to the issue of the writ.

The Divisional Court (following Hemp v. Garland (1)) held the plaintiff's claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations, as that statute began to run when an instalment of interest was twenty-one days in arrear. From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

By the Statute of Limitations, 1623, s. 3:

"... all actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty . . . shall be commenced and sued within the time and limitation hereafter expressed and not after (that is to say) . . . within six years after the cause of such actions or suit and not after."

McCall, Q.C., and Morton Smith for the plaintiff.
Loehnis for the defendant.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of opinion that we cannot differ from the judgment below without altering the law. The agreement is one reasonably easy to be understood. It provides for a loan of five years subject to a provision that, if default is made in punctual payment of interest, the principal shall be recoverable at once. The Statute of Limitations, 1623, enacts that such actions as therein mentioned, including "all actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty," shall be brought "within six years next after the cause of such action or suit, and not after." This expression "cause of action" has been repeatedly the subject of decision, and it has been held, particularly in Hemp v. Garland (1), decided in 1843, that the cause of action arises at the time when the debt could first have been recovered by action. The right to bring an action may arise on various events; but it has always been held that the statute runs from the earliest time at which an action could be brought.

FRY, L.J.—We have not to determine whether the defence here set up is handsome or conscientious, but whether it is good at law. I am of opinion that it is. The agreement contains a stipulation that the lender shall not call in the principal sum for a period of five years, if the borrower should so long live, and should duly and regularly pay the interest. This implies a contract by the borrower that the principal should be paid at once on the death of the borrower, or on default in payment of interest. The subsequent provisos imply a contract by the lender not to enforce payment after the death of the borrower until the expiration of six months' notice, and a contract not to enforce a payment of the capital for default in payment of interest until twenty-one days after such default, thus giving the borrower further time. Subject to these stipulations the implied contract to pay the principal remained in force. The principal, therefore, became payable twenty-one days after the first quarterly instalment of interest became due, and from that time the Statute of Limitations began to run. If authority is wanted, Hemp v. Garland (1) is in point.

- A LOPES, L.J. -The defendant alleges that the cause of action arose more than six years before the action was commenced, and that the action is barred by the Statute of Limitations. When first had the plaintiff a cause of action? When default was made for twenty-one days in payment of an instalment of interest. Hemp v. Garland (1) is in point. It is said that this case is not good law, and that it has not been referred to for many years. I think that it has not been referred to because it has been acquiesced in, and it does not appear that it has ever been questioned.

Administration of Estates—Appropriation of estate to interest of beneficiary—Power of executor—Implied power—No direction in will—Mortgage—Delivery to beneficiary—No transfer executed.

F A testator directed that his estate should be converted and the residue divided among six beneficiaries. The will contained no express power of appropriation. The executor agreed with one of the beneficiaries, but without the consent of the others, to appropriate to him at a proper value a mortgage as part of his share of residue, and handed him the mortgage deed, but executed no transfer of the mortgage to him. At the time when this was done the sum secured by the mortgage was less than the estimated amount of this beneficiary's share of the residue, but some of the assets were subsequently lost and the residuary estate greatly reduced. In an action by another residuary beneficiary for a declaration that the mortgage was part of the assets of the testator's estate,

G Held: (i) the executor had power, even though there was no express direction in the will, to agree with a beneficiary to appropriate to him one of the assets of the estate provided that it was appropriated at its proper value and that this value did not exceed the amount which it was estimated at the time of appropriation the beneficiary was entitled to receive; and (ii) the appropriation had been completely carried out, even though no transfer had been executed, and the mortgage no longer formed one of the assets of the testator's estate.

H Notes. In addition to their power of appropriation under the general law, I executors now have a statutory power of appropriation under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 41 (9 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 746).

Appeal by G. L. Jackson from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., holding that a mortgage for £700 which he claimed had been appropriated to him by the executor of George Lepine deceased towards satisfaction of his share of the residue had not been validly appropriated. A

By his will, dated Sept. 14, 1887, George Lepine gave the residue of his real and personal estate to J. R. Lewis and the defendant, C. T. Culver, upon trust to convert the same, and after payment thereof of his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies, to stand possessed of the residue of the proceeds thereof, as to one-sixth part in trust for his niece, Anne Jackson; as to another sixth part in trust for his nephew, George Lepine Jackson; as to another sixth part in trust for his nephew Finch L. Jackson; as to another sixth part in trust to invest the same in manner therein mentioned, with power to vary the investments, and to pay the income thereof to his sister, Alice L. Jackson, during her life, and after her death for her son, the plaintiff, Thomas F. Jackson; as to another sixth part in trust to invest the same in manner aforesaid, and to pay the income to the plaintiff, George F. Dowsett, during his life, and after his decease in trust for his wife and children as therein mentioned; and as to the remaining sixth part in trust to invest the same in manner aforesaid, and to pay the income to his niece, Mary E. Strange, during her life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and after her death in trust for her children, as therein mentioned. And the testator appointed J. R. Lewis and the defendant executors of his will. The will contained no express power to appropriate specific portions of the estate to the residuary legatees. The testator died on May 23, 1878, and his will was proved by the defendant alone, J. R. Lewis having renounced probate. The testator's residuary real estate was valued, at his death, at about £1,750, and his residuary personal estate at about £18,163, of which more than £11,000 was invested on mortgage. B C D E

This action was brought by G. F. Dowsett, as tenant for life of one of the settled shares, against the executor Culver, who, as was alleged, had misappropriated some of the estate, and had absconded, for administration of the testator's real and personal estate. Culver did not appear, and an order for administration and a receiver was made in his absence. From the chief clerk's certificate it appeared that the defendant had soon after the testator's death deposited with George L. Jackson, as part of his sixth share of the estate, a mortgage deed dated Jan. 4, 1870, by which a sum of £700 with interest was secured to the testator. No transfer of the mortgage to George L. Jackson had been executed, but he received the interest on the mortgage debt for more than ten years. The defendant had also paid George L. Jackson £2,270 in further satisfaction of his share. In consequence of the loss of some of the assets, it afterwards appeared that the two sums of £700 and £2,270 represented more than the proper amount of his share. The plaintiff asked for a declaration that the mortgage of Jan. 4, 1870, was not properly made over to George L. Jackson in part satisfaction of his share of the testator's estate. On July 29, 1891, the action came on for further consideration before KEKEWICH, J., who held that the arrangement that G. L. Jackson should take the mortgage for £700 as part of his one-sixth share could not be made against the other parties and made an order to the effect that the mortgage formed part of the estate of the testator. From this decision G. L. Jackson appealed. F G H I

LINDLEY, L.J.—If all that has been said about what executors cannot do were true, executors would find it very difficult to administer any estate at all.

The trusts of this will are simple enough. What appears to have been done is this. The executor, the defendant Mr. Culver, shortly after the testator's death, proceeded to distribute the estate. One of the persons entitled to one-sixth was a person who was of age and capable of entering into an agreement with the executor as to how he should take his sixth; and instead of taking it in cash he and the

A executor agree together that he should take a mortgage for £700 in part payment of his legacy. Assuming for the moment that there were assets, and that the £700, in addition to what he got in cash or other securities, did not exceed the amount due to him, what is there amiss with that? What is there to prevent the trustee or the executor making such a transaction? It is said that he cannot do it. It is said that the executor cannot make an agreement with one legatee of one-sixth

B without the consent of all the persons entitled to the other five-sixths. But why? If the assets are amply sufficient to satisfy the other five-sixths, why cannot one legatee at once say, "I will not trouble you to turn my share into cash; give me something instead of it which I will take."

Of course, it must be a fair transaction. The legatee says, "There is a mortgage for £700—a very good security—and I am content to take it at £700." Nobody is

C likely to give more than twenty shillings in the pound, I suppose, for a mortgage—and he takes it at that price. He does not take a legal transfer of the mortgage it is true; but he takes the deed. For more than ten years he takes the interest on the mortgage, and now because the executor has some ten years after the death of the testator absconded and some of the residuary estate cannot be found—some of the settled shares I suppose have been made away with—it is said on behalf of the

D persons entitled to the settled shares, "You, the legatee, who have been satisfied, must refund or give up the mortgage security." On what conceivable principle is he to do that? Just consider what has been done. The inference from that which took place is irresistible. The true inference is, that the legatee took this mortgage in satisfaction of his legacy to the extent of £700. It might have been put in a more formal shape. The executor might have said to the legatee, "I can sell you

E this mortgage for £700. Will you buy it, and will you agree to set off your legacy against the purchase money." All that might have been gone through, but the substance of that has been done; and to say that an executor cannot enter into a transaction like that with a residuary legatee or any other legatee is tantamount to saying that an executor cannot do what any other business man could do with similar obligations.

F I cannot accede to the proposition that the executor in any way failed to discharge his duty to that legatee or to the other legatees, provided, as I said before, he did not give any legatee more than his share. That is the whole of this transaction. The claim is based upon the theory that the three legatees who were entitled to receive their shares have not received them; and there is nothing in the pleadings seeking in any way to disturb what has been done. The pleadings are

G simply addressed to getting in and protecting what remains, and in the course of the inquiry the facts to which I have alluded have come out, and the learned judge has taken away from the legatee the mortgage which he has received in satisfaction of this legacy, because forsooth he has not got a legal transfer. Whether this gentleman will ever be able to get a legal transfer from Mr. Culver, who has absconded, I do not know; he may perhaps be able to get a vesting order; I do not

H say anything about that. He is not asking us for anything; he is only asking to remain as he is. It appears to me that those who have brought him here, who have raised this controversy and sought to deprive him of his mortgage, must pay the whole of the costs here and below.

BOWEN, L.J.—I should not add anything except that we are differing from the

I judgment of a very experienced judge, and, therefore, I wish to add my view of the matter. The case of T. F. Jackson and A. F. Jackson has been argued with the greatest ingenuity by their counsel, and I cannot conceive any better way of putting their case. But the more you look at the case and sift it, the more clear it becomes to my mind that it breaks down. They have endeavoured to assimilate this to the case of a voluntary assignment of a beneficial interest in a mortgage without consideration, and one not completed by a transfer of the legal estate.

The first observation that occurs to me is, that this is not the case of a voluntary assignment without consideration. It seems to me that there is ample consideration of a character which will appear in a moment; it was a completed transaction, and if it is equivalent to a payment, it is quite certain that this cannot now be set aside. It seems to me that it is accord and satisfaction; that is equivalent to a payment. The transaction had been effected by the handing over of these deeds to the legatee, and his receipt of the amount of interest in respect of the mortgage. It cannot be doubted that the executor might have sold the mortgage by private contract for what it was worth. It cannot be doubted that he might sell it to the legatee, and agree to set off the purchase money against the legacy; and then he might further agree with the legatee that he should hold the legal estate for him. The whole of that can be put in a short compass, and it is exactly what has been done. The right to the legal estate is not a right which after this transaction any longer depends upon the will; it depends upon the transaction itself. I cannot myself see how executors could carry on business if this sort of arrangement was to be invalid.

FRY, L.J.—I also find myself unable to agree with the learned judge. There are two propositions which have been put before us in various forms by the learned counsel who have argued for T. F. Jackson and A. F. Jackson which I think are perfectly true. Supposing an executor or trustee divides the estate in such a manner as that he gives to one legatee or cestui que trust property or securities worth twenty shillings in the pound, and he gives to another rubbish and trash which is not worth its nominal value or the value at which he takes it, I have no doubt that such trustee or executor is guilty of a breach of trust, and that any legatee who takes the good securities with notice of what has been done may be made liable for that breach of trust. That is one proposition that I think is perfectly true. Another that has been put forward from time to time is to this effect: Where there is an imperfect gift made and the legal estate remains in the donor, there being no consideration, the whole transaction being in the nature of a gift, there the court will not assist the donee to perfect that gift. This again is a perfectly true proposition of law. But neither of these two propositions of law seems to me to have the remotest relation to the present discussion.

In the present case, for anything that appears, the trustee did his duty at the time at which he divided the estate. There is no suggestion before us that he improperly appropriated the funds to the settled shares, or that he showed any favour whatever to George Lepine Jackson, to whose share he appropriated this mortgage. It appears to me that all that is before us is this: The executor, being under an obligation to realise the estate and to get it in, got in this mortgage by sale of it to George Lepine Jackson, and George Lepine Jackson agreed to set off the purchase money which he was to pay for that mortgage against his share of the estate. If that was done honestly and righteously and equally between all the cestuis que trust, that was an unobjectionable transaction—that is all that it was. I think, therefore, that there is nothing whatever to be complained of in this transaction. I am bound to say that I cannot assent to the view which the learned judge has taken of the obligation of trustees. I agree as fully as it can be expressed that it is the duty of trustees to hold a perfectly even hand between all their cestuis que trust; but, provided they do that, there is no objection whatever to their entering into arrangements which are of the nature of the sale of a particular asset which they are bound to convert to a cestui que trust, setting off the purchase money for that asset against the portion which the cestui que trust is entitled to in the testator's estate. I think, therefore, that the judgment below must be reformed by striking out the declaration of the learned judge to the effect that this forms part of the estate of the testator.

A part payment only postpones the running of time under the Statute of Limitations if it is made to the creditor or his agent so as to be a pro tanto discharge of the debt. Where, therefore, part payments of principal and interest were made by the maker of a promissory note to the original holder after such holder had, without the knowledge of the maker, assigned the note,
Held: the payments did not postpone the running of time.

Per LORD HERSCHELL: There may possibly be an exception to this general rule, e.g., where a payment is made to a person as filling a representative capacity or who is believed to fill a representative capacity, and is received by that person for the benefit of those whom he represents, it may be that such payment enures for the benefit of the persons for whose benefit it was intended to be made.

Appeal by the plaintiffs, the Stamford, Spalding and Boston Banking Co., Ltd., C from a decision of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., holding that their action against the defendant Alfred Smith on a promissory note was barred under the Statute of Limitations.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, as holders of a promissory note for £200, with interest, dated Oct. 9, 1879, made by the defendant, payable on demand to Charles Konow or his order. Konow had endorsed the note without the know- D ledge of the defendant to the Northamptonshire Union Bank as security for the overdraft of his current account. In 1882 Konow transferred his account to the plaintiffs, who paid off his overdraft with the Northamptonshire Bank, and took over the securities which that bank held, including the note, which was endorsed to the plaintiffs. In 1883 the defendant commenced to pay to Konow E interest and principal on the note by instalments, and ultimately paid him the balance on Dec. 6, 1889. Konow gave the defendant a receipt for the whole amount, but did not give up the note. He said that he had not got the note with him, but told the defendant that he would destroy it. Konow died shortly afterwards. The plaintiffs subsequently notified to the defendant that they were the F holders of the note and requested him to meet it; but they credited him with the sum of £50 which he had paid to Konow on account on Nov. 9, 1885, and which Konow had paid to the plaintiffs, and they had entered against his security.

As a defence to the action the defendant set up the plea of the Statute of Limitations G (1623), the note being more than six years old, and contended that the payments to Konow were no acknowledgment of indebtedness to the plaintiffs.
The plaintiffs relied on the payment of £50 on Nov. 9, 1885, as an acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute. The action was tried before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., sitting without a jury, at the Northamptonshire Summer Assizes, 1891. He held that the action was barred under the Statute of Limitations. From that decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Lindsell (W. Graham with him) for the plaintiffs.

Etherington Smith and John Raymond for the defendant.

LORD HERSCHELL shortly stated the facts above set out, and continued: The H action on the promissory note is prima facie barred by the Statute of Limitations.
But the plaintiffs seek to avoid the operation of the statute by saying that there has been a part payment made by the defendant in respect of the note which takes the case out of the statute. The payment relied on was made on Nov. 9, 1885. I
If that payment can be relied on by the plaintiffs as a part payment or acknowledgment of the debt, then, as it was made within six years before this action was brought, it would take the case out of the statute. That payment, however, was not made to the plaintiffs who now hold the note. It was made to Konow, the original holder of the note. The plaintiffs, however, contend that payment being made in respect of the note, amounted to an acknowledgment that the remainder of the debt was still due, and that that acknowledgment enures to the benefit of the plaintiffs. The balance of the note was at the later date paid to Konow by

A the defendant, who did not know that the note had been endorsed away by Konow. The plaintiffs argue that, although the payment was not made intentionally to Konow as agent for them, or with the knowledge that they had any interest in the note, but was made in the belief that the debt was still due to Konow, yet nevertheless the plaintiffs can take advantage of the payment as being in effect an acknowledgment by the defendant that he still owed the remainder of the debt to anyone who was entitled to sue upon the note.

B It cannot now be disputed that an acknowledgment, in order to exclude the operation of the Statute of Limitations, must be absolute and unconditional, and one from which a promise to pay the debt can be inferred. It was argued by counsel for the plaintiffs that the fact of the acknowledgment was the material thing, and that it did not signify to whom it was made. Such appears to have been the law at one time. There are certainly dicta to that effect. But, in my opinion, the law is now well settled that an acknowledgment by way of part payment to a stranger will not be sufficient. The acknowledgment must be such that a promise to pay, made either with the creditor or his agent, can be inferred from it. The law is so stated by POLLOCK, C.B., in Godwin v. Culley (2).

C Counsel for the plaintiffs relied mainly on Clark v. Hooper (3), where a payment had been made to a person as administratrix who had not, in fact, taken out letters of administration in the proper diocese. There are no doubt dicta in some of the judgments in that case that the payment had the same effect as an acknowledgment made to a third person, and that that was sufficient. In my opinion the decision in that case cannot be supported on that ground, although the decision itself may be supported on the ground (which I will presently explain) of its being an exception to the general rule.

E If then an acknowledgment, in order to be sufficient, must amount to a promise to pay made either with the creditor or his agent, it would seem a fortiori that the payment must be a payment made either to the creditor or his agent. Indeed, if it were not made to the creditor or his agent, it would be a misuse of language to call it a payment at all. Unless it operated as a discharge wholly or pro tanto of the obligation in respect of which it was given, it could not be a payment. Money might pass, but there would be no payment—no discharge of the debt—unless it was received by the person to whom the debt was due, or by an agent on his behalf.

F There may, however, possibly be an exception to this general rule of law; e.g., where a payment is made to a person as filling a representative capacity, or who is believed to fill a representative capacity, and is received by that person for the benefit of those whom he represents. It may be that such payment enures for the benefit of the persons for whose benefit it was intended to be. Clark v. Hooper (3) may be supported on that ground. The payment in that case was intended to be for the benefit of the estate of the deceased creditor. At the time the payment was made there was no person to whom the payments due to the estate could properly be made. But the intention of the debtor in making the payment was to make a payment in discharge of his debt due to the estate, and not to the administratrix for her own benefit. And it might well be that such payment enured for the benefit of the estate, and that when a proper administration was taken out the proper administrator could avail himself of it.

H In my opinion, therefore, the acknowledgment or payment must be made to the creditor or to some person on his behalf. In the present case, however, the defendant, when in 1885 he made the payment to Konow, did not intend to pay it to him in any representative capacity. He paid it in the belief that he was discharging the liability he thought himself to be still under to Konow. There was no promise or acknowledgment to anyone except Konow. The plaintiffs, therefore, can only establish their case by showing that Konow was their agent. At the time of payment Konow was admittedly not their agent; and, therefore, at that time there was really no payment at all, and the plaintiffs could have the next day sued the defendant for the full amount of the note. But it is said on behalf of the plaintiffs that they afterwards adopted the transaction and accepted Konow as their agent, and treated the payment as a payment made in respect of the note. I am not satisfied that that would be sufficient. But even if it were sufficient, then the plaintiffs are in this difficulty, that, if they adopt Konow as their agent for receiving the payment made by the defendant in 1885, they cannot repudiate the subsequent transactions in which Konow, acting just as he had done before, received other payments from the defendant, who had received no notice from the plaintiffs that they had put an end to Konow's agency. The plaintiffs would, therefore, be bound by Konow's receipt of the balance on the subsequent occasion. The plaintiffs have consequently not established any case for excluding the operation of the statute, and their action is accordingly barred by the statute. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It would be very hard on the defendant if he were compelled to pay the note over again. The note had been negotiated without the defendant's knowledge, and he had honestly paid the person whom he believed to be his creditor. The question is, whether he can make a good defence under the Statute of Limitations? I am happy to think that he can. This is one of the few cases in which the Statute of Limitations comes in aid of an honest defence. The question resolves itself into this, whether the payment made in 1885 by the defendant to Konow can be treated by the plaintiffs as such an acknowledgment of the defendant's indebtedness as would prevent him setting up the Statute of Limitations as a defence.

There was a time no doubt when an acknowledgment to a third person would have been held sufficient. But since Tanner v. Smart (1) the law has changed in that respect, and it is now well settled that to take the case out of the statute the payment must be a payment to the creditor or his agent so as to be a pro tanto discharge.

Clark v. Hooper (3) only amounts to this, that a mistake made by both parties would not prevent the payment having the effect that it was intended to have. The payment there was made and intended to operate as a payment to an administrator, although he had not taken out administration in two counties. It was made to him as administrator and was held good. I agree, however, that the grounds given for the decision cannot now be supported. But I see no reason to quarrel with the decision itself.

KAY, L.J.—I think that the short and simple answer to the plaintiffs' case is this: The money handed by the defendant to Konow was not a payment of part of the debt. There are two modes in which you may escape the operation of the Statute of Limitations, namely, by part payment or a written acknowledgment. Lord Tenderden's Act, s. 1, provided that no acknowledgment or promise by words only should be deemed sufficient evidence of a new contract whereby to take any case out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations. But Lord Tenderden's Act did not take away or lower the effect of any payment of principal or interest. Before Lord Tenderden's Act a part payment of the debt within the statutory limit of time was held sufficient to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. But it was never held that the mere handing over of money to a third person—not the creditor or his agent—was a payment from which a promise to pay could be inferred. The only payment from which a promise to pay could be inferred was a payment which discharged the debt in part. A mere handing over of money to a third person is not payment of a part of the debt, and is no bar to the Statute of Limitations. I think the Statute of Limitations is a complete answer to the present claim.

C. applied for an order that her former solicitors should deliver up documents in their custody belonging to her on payment of her bill of costs amounting to £20 12s. 9d. The solicitors claimed a lien for a sum of £81 14s. 2d. which they said was due from C. and in respect of which they delivered an account showing cash advances and other items besides their taxable costs charges and expenses. The solicitors, without expressly reserving their lien, had taken from C. as security for the amount owing from her a charge on a policy of life assurance and a promissory note from C. and her husband.

Held: (i) a solicitor's lien on documents extended only to such items as were properly included in a bill of costs, i.e., his taxable costs, charges, and expenses which might be moderated by the master, but not to ordinary advances or loans; and (ii) whether or not a lien was waived depended upon the intention expressed or inferred, on the position of the parties, and on the circumstances of the case; in the absence of contrary evidence, the solicitors must be presumed to have waived their lien by accepting such a security without expressly reserving the lien.

Appeal by Mrs. Payne Collier from a decision of STIRLING, J., refusing an application by her that she might be at liberty to pay into court the sum of £20 12s. 9d. without prejudice to the taxation of the bill of fees, charges, and disbursements delivered to her by Messrs. Taylor, Stileman, and Underwood, and that they might be ordered to deliver up to her or her solicitors all deeds, books, papers, and writings in their custody or power belonging to her.

Messrs. Taylor, Stileman, and Underwood had, for some time, acted as solicitors for Mrs. Payne Collier in various matters and actions and claimed a lien on certain papers on account of costs. They had delivered an account to her from which there appeared to be a sum of £81 14s. 2d. due from her to them. The account included a bill of costs of £20 12s. 9d., and also cash advances by the firm to Mrs. Collier, and among other things a sum of £11 11s. paid to the sheriff, who had taken possession of furniture in respect of a judgment against her husband. STIRLING, J., refused the application. The applicant appealed. It appeared on the appeal that Messrs. Taylor, Stileman, and Underwood had taken a charge on a policy of assurance on the life of Mrs. Payne Collier to secure the sum of £200 due from her to the firm with interest at 5 per cent.; they also held a promissory note for £200 of Mr. and Mrs. Payne Collier bearing interest at 5 per cent. as security for what was due from her. When taking the charge, the solicitors had not expressly resumed their lien.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of STIRLING, J., refusing to direct or order certain solicitors to hand over their client's papers upon her paying into court the amount due from her to them in respect of their costs, and the controversy which has arisen has assumed rather a serious shape.

We have first of all to consider for what a solicitor has any lien at all. I take it that he has a lien for all his costs, charges, and expenses incurred by him as the solicitor of his client. I take it that he has no lien for ordinary advance or loans. His taxed costs, charges, and expenses, or rather his taxable costs, charges, and expenses, will not exclude advances. He makes advances for his client in the course of the business, such as for counsel's fees and other matters, all of which are taxable by the master in this sense, that they can be moderated. They are subject to the jurisdiction of the taxing master to moderate, and whatever costs, charges, and expenses can be so dealt with, it appears to me that he has a lien for upon his client's papers. It is a general lien upon all papers for all such costs, charges, and expenses; but the lien does not extend to other advances which do not come under the category which I have described. I come to this conclusion not only from the authorities, but upon the express language of the Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28, which enables a solicitor to obtain a lien on property preserved or recovered, but only for his taxed costs, charges, and expenses, and I think these words express accurately the kind of costs for which he has a lien.

He claims in this case a lien for advances which it is alleged by him come under that category, and I thought at one time that as to the sum £11 11s. it was such an advance, because it was stated to us that there was a judgment against his client, the sheriff was in possession, and he as solicitor paid the sheriff out. If that were so, it strikes me that that would be a charge properly taxable by the taxing master. But it now appears that it is a judgment against his client's husband, and the wife says to him, "Go and pay the sheriff out," he having taken

A possession of the furniture. The sum advanced by the solicitor for such a purpose has nothing to do with costs, charges, or expenses properly taxable as between him and his client. It would be a loan. It would not be taxable by the taxing master, nor open to moderation by him. The eleven guineas, therefore, appear to be under the category of an advance for which there is no lien.

B There is another point, an important one, raised by counsel for Mrs. Payne Collier. He says, that whatever lien these solicitors had was waived by reason of their having taken a security, the security being a promissory note given to them by the solicitors' client, who was a lady, a married woman, and by her husband a promissory note bearing interest at 5 per cent., and also a charge upon a certain policy. He says that taking that security was a waiver of whatever lien the solicitors would otherwise have, and for that proposition he relied mostly C on Roberts v. Jeffreys (2), a decision of SIR JOHN LEACH. The precise point which arose in that case appears to be the exact point which arises here. It is a question between a solicitor and client. There was a lien claimed by the solicitor, the client gave a promissory note payable on demand and bearing interest at 5 per cent. SIR JOHN LEACH said that such a security was a waiver of the lien.

D Whether a lien is waived or not depends upon the intention expressed or inferred, upon the position of the parties, and the circumstances of the case. In this particular instance we are dealing with a solicitor and his client, and that appears to me to be very clear and precise. It strikes me, I confess, that if a solicitor takes from his client such a security as this solicitor has taken (a promissory note bearing interest and a charge upon a policy), that prima facie in every sense he does waive his lien. It appears to me that this is a right and proper conclusion to come to, bearing in mind that it is the solicitor's duty to his client to explain E clearly the effect of every document. If a banker asked me for a security I should not understand he was giving up his lien, unless something to that effect was said; but, bearing in mind the position of the parties, it appears to me that, having regard to the decision of SIR JOHN LEACH, we are justified in saying that, in the absence of all evidence to the contrary, the lien was waived upon that F ground. It appears to me, therefore, that counsel is right, and that on both points this appeal ought to succeed.

LOPES, L.J.—A solicitor has a lien for all his taxed costs, charges, and expenses, and the lien clearly does not extend to any money advanced for any other purposes, that is to say, any purposes for which the solicitor is employed.

G In this case there was a sum of eleven guineas, an amount paid by the firm of solicitors in question in order to release their client's furniture, and for some time I thought that that sum might be brought within the rule that I have laid down; but when that matter came to be more particularly investigated it was found that the judgment was not against the wife but against the husband, and the judgment being against the husband the wife's furniture was taken, and therefore she told her solicitor, and asked him to pay the sheriff out—not, I understand, H at all in his capacity of a solicitor, but in the same way that an ordinary friend might advance money in order to release her furniture. It appears to me that that amount was not a taxable item. It was a voluntary advance made by the solicitor, not as a solicitor but, as I have already stated, in the way that an advance might be made by any friend of the wife. I am of opinion, therefore, that the lien only I applies to taxable costs, charges, and expenses which may be reduced or moderated by the taxing master, and that on that point counsel for Mrs. Payne Collier is right.

There is another point raised in regard to a security taken by the solicitor. It is stated that the lien was lost in this case because he had taken a security. With regard to that matter, it appears to me that regard must be had to the particular circumstances of the case, and whether there are circumstances which are sufficient to raise an inference (an inference which may be rebutted) that the parties intended to abandon the old security. Among other things there is here a promissory note payable on demand with interest at 5 per cent. running from the time of the advance, and also a security on a policy, and it is not a promissory note merely given by the wife, but by her husband, and this is a security larger, and, in my mind, very different to that which was given by the lien. It is only a fair inference to draw from the facts I have stated that there was an intention between the parties to abandon the lien, and to rely upon the security. On that point, too, counsel is right. With regard to this matter, I may say that we are deciding this point with regard to the security strictly in accordance with the decision of Roberts v. Jeffreys (2).

KAY, L.J.—There are two very important points raised in this case: one as to the extent of the ordinary lien of a solicitor; and the other as to how far that lien may be destroyed by taking another security. I do not find in any of the cases, nor in any of the books which I have had an opportunity to refer to during the course of this appeal, any exact definition of how far the lien of a solicitor extends. In one of the text-books to which I referred—MORGAN AND WURTZBURG ON COSTS—the doctrine stated, at p. 551, is merely this:

“The solicitor has a lien on the papers of his client in his hand for the amount of his costs.”

In another text-book I find “for his professional charges”; and the nearest definition which I can discover is by SIR THOMAS PLUMER, in Worrall v. Johnson (3), where he says (2 Jac. & W. at p. 218):

“There are two kinds of lien which the solicitor has for his bill of costs; one on funds recovered, and one on papers in his hands. . . . This lien, however, does not extend to general debts, but only to costs due to him in the character of attorney.”

From the words used, “his bill of costs,” I take it as very clearly expressed that the lien extends to all those items which are properly included in the bill of costs; that is, in other and more definite words, to all such charges which the taxing master has a right to consider and moderate. So much for the first point.

The second point is one which has been fully dealt with, and I will only say a word or two about the law. As to the sort of security which will be considered to destroy the lien of a solicitor, we have the judgment of LORD ELDON in Cowell v. Simpson (1), where the security given was a promissory note, payable in three years. LORD ELDON says (16 Ves. at p. 281):

“The exigencies of mankind requiring the goods to be delivered for consumption, the implication from an engagement for security. If an engagement to deliver the goods without payment is necessary; otherwise from a promissory note, payable in three years, a contract must be implied that the goods are to be retained during that period; destroying the other special contract. So in this instance, if the solicitor says he will not proceed in the business, and will not deliver up the papers, the consequence is that he destroys the express contract to postpone payment for three years. Therefore, unless from the fact that he has taken this security you can imply that he is to keep the papers for three years, though the vital interests of the owner may depend on the possession of them, the implication is necessary that he is to deliver them up, and rely on the other contract.”

LORD ELDON there relied on the fact that the promissory note was not payable for three years.

In Stevenson v. Blakelock (4) LORD ELLENBOROUGH said (1 M. & S. at p. 544):

“It is unnecessary to canvass the doctrine in Cowell v. Simpson (1), inasmuch as there is a material distinction between that case and the present; for there the bills were running, and there was no reason to presume that they would not be duly paid; in this case the bills have been refused payment. Assuming

A then the position of the Lord Chancellor to be correct, here there is the further circumstance of the bills being dishonoured, which places this defendant in his original situation as to lien."

In Balch v. Symes (5) LORD ELDON said (Turn. & R. at p. 92):

B "Notwithstanding the Court of King's Bench has expressed a doubt whether my decision was right in the case of Cowell v. Simpson (1), I still entertain the opinion that an attorney who takes a security abandons his lien."

This has been construed as laying down that a solicitor taking a security for his costs always abandons his lien; but LORD ELDON does not say that; he only said that he abode by his former judgment.

C I take it the true rule is that stated by LINDLEY, L.J., that in every case where you have to consider whether a lien has been waived or given up, you must weigh all the circumstances of the particular case, and no doubt it is most material that you are dealing with a case between a solicitor and his own client. A solicitor has a duty to his client to represent to his client all the facts and obligations of the case in a clear and intelligible manner, and where you find a solicitor dealing with his client and taking from him such a security as was given in this case, not expressly reserving his right of lien, not explaining to his client that the right of lien would be existing notwithstanding the security taken, I quite agree with what LINDLEY, L.J., says, that the inference ought to be against the solicitor and against the continuance of the lien, as being inconsistent with the sort of security taken. In Roberts v. Jeffreys (2) SIR JOHN LEACH held that a promissory note of the same kind as that in the present case took away the lien.

E I think, therefore, that counsel for Mrs. Payne Collier is right in his contention on both points, and that the order of STIRLING, J., ought to be dissolved, and an order made according to the terms of the summons, as Mrs. Payne Collier does not desire to withdraw from the offer to pay the £20 12s. 9d. into court.

GREENWOOD v. SUTCLIFFE AND OTHERS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.), November 10, 11, 1891]

[Reported [1892] 1 Ch. 1; 61 L.J.Ch. 59; 65 L.T. 797;
40 W.R. 214]Mortgage—Redemption—Tender—Unconditional tender—Right to dispute amount due reserved when making tender—Right of mortgagor to account.

A tender was made by the solicitor of a mortgagor to mortgagees in possession of the balance appearing to be due to them for principal, interest, and costs according to an account which had been made out by the mortgagor from documents furnished by the mortgagees. That balance was, however, less than the sum claimed by the mortgagees to be due. The solicitor stated, at that time, that he did not admit the correctness of the mortgagees' accounts, and that he intended to take steps to dispute them and to have the costs taxed. The mortgagees having refused to accept the sum tendered, the mortgagor brought an action for redemption.

Held: (i) although the mortgagor's solicitor reserved the right to dispute the amount due when making the tender, the tender was unconditional, and, therefore, valid; and (ii) the mortgagor was entitled to an account to ascertain whether the tender was sufficient, the court reserving further consideration and costs in case it proved to be sufficient, but making the ordinary decree against a mortgagee in possession (giving him the costs of the action) if the tender was found to be insufficient.

Appeal by the plaintiff, a mortgagor, from a decision of STIRLING, J., by which he refused, when making an order for redemption, to grant the plaintiff a declaration that she had previously made a valid tender to the defendants, as mortgagees, of the moneys owing.

On Aug. 17, 1882, the sum of £4,000 was advanced by the defendants to Charles Roberts on the security of certain copyhold property under an indenture bearing that date and made between C. Roberts of the first part, the plaintiff and her late husband of the second part, and the defendants of the third part. Part of the mortgaged property belonged to C. Roberts, and the remainder to the plaintiff, who joined in the security only as surety for C. Roberts. The mortgaged property was duly surrendered on the same day. On May 13, 1887, C. Roberts was adjudicated a bankrupt. Shortly afterwards some buildings on C. Roberts's part of the mortgaged property were burnt down, and the insurance money was applied by the defendants in part payment of what was due to them. The defendants entered into possession. In January, 1890, the plaintiff's solicitor informed the defendants' solicitors that the plaintiff was prepared to pay all interest to the end of 1889. The defendants accordingly made out an account, showing that on Dec. 31, 1889, there was due to the defendants the sum of £1,975 10s. 4d. for principal, and the sum of £330 9s. 9d. for interest. On April 3, 1890, C. Roberts's trustee

A in bankruptcy sold and conveyed to the plaintiff C. Roberts's equity of redemption in his part of the mortgaged property. The defendants alleged that, owing to a mistake of their accountant, a sum of £59 3s. 4d. due for interest up to February, 1887, was omitted, and they also claimed to add a sum of £20 6s. 6d. to the amount of capital. On May 9, 1890, the plaintiff paid the defendants the sum of £330 9s. 9d. for interest, and the defendants gave a receipt for it as received on account of interest. In July, 1890, the plaintiff expressed her readiness to pay off what was due on the mortgage. In September, 1890, the defendants sent in an account showing the sum of £2,473 7s. 8d. to be due to them on the 26th of that month. The plaintiff's solicitor objected to it, and the defendants sent in another account, but no agreement was come to.

C The plaintiff alleged that the account sent in by the defendants, in which the item of £59 3s. 4d. was omitted, amounted to a representation, on the faith of which the plaintiff had acted in the arrangements with C. Roberts's trustee in bankruptcy, and that the defendants were bound by it not to claim the omitted sum. Ultimately, at the hearing before STIRLING, J., the plaintiff abandoned this point. The plaintiff also complained of the amount of costs, alleging that many of the expenses were unnecessary. On Sept. 30, 1890, the plaintiff's solicitor D called on the defendants' solicitors with the following account:

The plaintiff's solicitor tendered the sum of £2,136 2s. 7d. The defendants' solicitors refused to receive it, but wrote at the foot of the account, and signed, the following memorandum:

G "Without admitting the correctness of this account, we admit tender and refusal of £2,136 2s. 7d.

W. and G. BURR & Co."

H The plaintiff took out an originating summons, asking for an order that an account might be taken of what, if anything, was due on the mortgage for principal, interest, and costs, other than the costs of this action, and to redeem the property; and that the defendants might be ordered to pay the costs of the action. The summons was adjourned to be heard in court by STIRLING, J., on May 7, 1891. Mr. Burr, one of the defendants, whose evidence was accepted by STIRLING, J., said:

I "Mr. Creeke [the plaintiff's solicitor] produced this account, at the same time taking from his pocket a small bag. He stated that he wished to make a tender. These were his words to the best of my recollection, 'I wish to make a tender.' He produced two copies of account and he asked me to sign a memorandum acknowledging the tender. I looked at the account, which I had not previously seen. I said, 'Am I to understand that if I take this sum of £2,136 2s. 7d. it settles the matter?' He said 'No'; he reserved his right of taxing the costs and of reviewing the figures. I then signed the memorandum, and I said I would mention the matter to my co-defendant."

He did not admit that Mr. Creeke had said anything about the tender being unreserved and unconditional. The common decree for redemption against a mortgagee in possession was made, giving the defendants their costs of the action. STIRLING, J., refused to grant the plaintiff a declaration that a valid tender had been made. A

The plaintiff gave notice of appeal from that order, asking that it should be varied by inserting a declaration that on Sept. 30, 1890, a good tender of £2,136 2s. 7d. for principal, interest, and costs was made by the plaintiffs to the defendants; and that accounts should be taken (i) of what, on Sept. 30, 1890, was due to the defendants for principal and interest in respect of their mortgage and for such (if any) costs, charges, and expenses as were secured thereby or as they were entitled to under their mortgage (such costs, charges and expenses to be taxed by the taxing master) after deducting therefrom the amount found to have been received by the defendants under the next-mentioned account; and (ii) of the rents and profits received by the defendants or which, but for their wilful neglect or default, might have been received up to Sept. 30, 1890. And, in case it should appear that the amount due to the defendants on Sept. 30, 1890, after deducting the rents and profits, did not exceed £2,136 2s. 7d., then adjourn further consideration and the costs of the action. But if it should appear that the amount due to the defendants on Sept. 30, 1890, on the said account, after deducting the rents and profits, exceeded £2,136 2s. 7d., then that the account directed by the order under appeal might be proceeded with. The appeal now came on for hearing. B C D

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case the appeal is by a mortgagor, who has brought an action to redeem. STIRLING, J., has pronounced the ordinary judgment for redemption. The plaintiff asks for the insertion of words to the effect that she made a valid tender to the mortgagees on Sept. 30, 1890, and for some other consequential additions to the judgment. Her object, of course, is this: that if she is right, and if she tendered enough, the interest will stop, and the fact of her having made such a tender will have a very serious bearing on the costs of the suit, although I do not say that it will determine the question of costs, because there may be other matters which the learned judge may have to take into account. F

The controversy in this appeal is whether there was, or was not, on Sept. 30, 1890, a valid tender of £2,136 2s. 7d. The learned judge has declined to insert in the judgment any declaration to the effect that there was a valid tender; and, as I understand his judgment, it proceeds upon the ground that, although there was a tender, it was a tender reserving to the person who made it the right to tax the mortgagees' costs, and also to review their account, they having been mortgagees in possession. The learned judge thought that this was not a valid tender in point of law, and there I think he made a mistake. I do not see the difference between the tender of that kind and such a tender as was made in Scott v. Uxbridge and Rickmansworth Rail. Co. (1), where the tender was in this form: G H

"If you insist on being paid the amount demanded before satisfactory explanations have been given, our clerk will hand you a cheque this morning for the amount £1,596 3s. 6d.; but you must consider the payment as under protest, and our client will seek to recover back what is overpaid afterwards." I

That tender was held to be sufficient.

What is the object of a tender? It is not necessarily to put an end to all controversy. It may have that effect, and very often has; but its main object is to throw the risks of further controversy upon the other party. There being controversies between the plaintiff and the defendants, the plaintiff made this tender in order to throw upon the defendants the risk of refusing to accept that sum as sufficient to cover their demands. The plaintiff was quite right in making

A that tender. She did make it, not conditionally, not throwing any burden upon her opponents, but as a fair and valid legal tender, and that is in fact admitted by the gentleman, not a layman, but a solicitor knowing what a tender means, who signed the following memorandum: "Without admitting the correctness of this account, we admit the tender and refusal of £2.136 2s. 7d." I think, therefore, that the plaintiff is right, and is entitled to have the judgment varied in the way

B asked by the notice of appeal. As the plaintiff is right, the proper order will be to give her her costs of the appeal in any event.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I should regard it as remarkable if the law was supposed to be unsettled on the question of tenders. A conditional tender is not an effectual tender in law; but a tender under protest

C is quite right. A man has a right to tender money reserving all his rights, and such a tender is good, provided he does not seek to impose conditions. I agree with the judgment of the lord justice.

THORN v. NINE REEFS, LTD.

F

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.), April 6, 1892]

Company—Debenture holder's action—Receiver and manager—Security not in jeopardy—Principal not immediately payable—Interest not in arrear.

G

On an application by a debenture holder entitled to a floating charge on the assets of a company for the appointment of a receiver, the court will only appoint a receiver if the security is in jeopardy.

Per Curiam: If it could be shown that the security was in jeopardy, the court would appoint a receiver even though the principal was not immediately payable and the interest was not in arrear for the period prescribed by the debenture.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., refusing to appoint a receiver of the defendant company.

The Nine Reefs, Ltd., was established in 1889 for the purpose of acquiring and working certain gold mines in Mysore, India. By a debenture trust deed, dated Jan. 3, 1890, and made between the company and two trustees, the company assigned to the trustees its leasehold interest in the mines, and also "all and singular the machinery, tools, implements, stores, plant, and effects situate and being on or appertaining to" the hereditaments (in India) described in the 1st schedule to the deed (the machinery, etc., being described in the 2nd schedule), and all other the machinery, etc., which during the continuance of the security should be on or appertain to the same hereditaments; and it was thereby agreed and declared (inter alia) that the trustees should stand possessed of the mortgaged premises as a security for the payment of the principal moneys and interests specified in the debentures intended to be issued by the company (which debentures were to be in number 4,000, of £5 each, and in the form set forth in the 4th schedule to the deed), and to the intent that the debentures should be a floating security on the mortgaged premises, and, accordingly, upon trust that the trustees should permit the company and their assigns to hold and enjoy all the same premises until default should be made in payment of some principal moneys secured by the debentures, or any of them, or in the payment of some interest on the same for the period of six calendar months after such principal moneys and interest respectively should become due according to the tenour of the debentures and of the covenant in that behalf thereafter contained, or until an order of some court of competent jurisdiction should be made, or an effective resolution of the company should be duly passed for the winding-up of the company, or until a breach of some covenant by the company thereafter contained should have been committed, and from and after such default, or the making of any such order, or the passing of any such resolution, or the commission of any such breach of covenant as aforesaid, upon trust that the trustees might as therein mentioned enter upon and take possession of the mortgaged premises and sell the same, and the trustees were to hold the moneys arising from any sale upon trust (after payment of costs and expenses) to pay first the interest and then the principal due in respect of the debentures pari passu as between the different debenture-holders. There was a covenant by the company with the trustees for payment of the principal moneys, bonuses, and interest secured by the debentures, in accordance with the tenour thereof respectively, and for the observance and performance of the several conditions endorsed thereon respectively; and also that the principal moneys and interest intended to be secured by the debentures should be a first charge by way of floating security on the mortgaged premises.

The form of debenture set forth in the 4th schedule provided that the company would

"on the            day of           , or on such earlier day as the principal moneys hereby secured became payable, in accordance with the conditions endorsed hereon, pay to            of           , or other the registered holder for the time being hereof, the sum of £5, together with a bonus of 10s. The company will in the meantime pay to such registered holder interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum by half-yearly payments on June 30 and Dec. 31 in each year. The company hereby charges with such payment its undertaking and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being. This debenture is issued subject to the conditions endorsed hereon."

Among the conditions endorsed were the following:

"(9) The registered holder hereof may at any time after Nov. 1, 1892, require the company to pay to him the sum of £5 hereby secured, together with a bonus of 10s., and together with the interest for the fraction (if any) of the current half-year up to the day of payment. (10) The principal moneys hereby secured shall immediately become payable (a) if the company makes default for a period of six calendar months in the payment of any interest

A hereby secured, and the registered holder hereof, before such interest is paid, by notice in writing to the company calls in such principal moneys; or (b) if an order is made or an effective resolution is passed for the winding-up of the company."

B The plaintiff applied for fifty of the debentures, and paid £250 for them, and there was issued to him a document, under the seal of the company, called a "provisional debenture scrip certificate." This document was signed by two of the directors and the secretary, and was expressed as follows:

C "This is to certify that , of , is entitled to debenture of the above issue for £5 each, bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly. Each debenture-holder is and will be entitled (pari passu with the other debenture-holders of this issue) to the benefit of, and subject to the provisions contained in, an indenture dated Jan. 3, 1890, and made between... whereby certain property of the company was made security for the payment of the principal moneys, bonus, and interest payable in respect of each debenture."

At the foot was the following note:

D "This provisional scrip will be exchanged for the debentures when the above-mentioned deed has been registered in India, so as to form a valid charge upon the property of the company as comprised therein."

E The interest on the plaintiff's debentures had been in arrear for more than three months, but not for six months, and in February, 1892, he commenced this action, on behalf of himself and all other the debenture-holders, to enforce the security. At the time when the writ was issued, the trust deed had not been registered in India, but the registration had since been effected. The company had no property of any value beyond that which was comprised in the trust deed.

F On Mar. 19, 1892, the plaintiff applied by motion to KEKEWICH, J., for the appointment of a receiver and manager of the mines and other assets, property, or rights of the company subject to the security created by the trust deed. The motion was refused. The plaintiff appealed.

C. E. E. Jenkins for the plaintiff.

Marten, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady for the company.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Eve for the trustees of the deed.

G LINDLEY, L.J.—I think that in this case the application is premature. The plaintiff has advanced his money to the company upon the terms of the contract contained in the provisional debenture scrip certificate, which provides that each debenture-holder is and will be entitled to the benefit of, and subject to the provisions contained in, the trust deed. The scrip is to be exchanged for debentures when the trust deed has been registered in India. What, therefore, are the H plaintiff's rights under his contract with the company? They are to have debentures issued to him, but not to ignore the condition in his contract that the debentures are to be subject to the provisions of the trust deed.

I The trust deed comes to this. The plaintiff is not yet entitled to have the benefit of that deed as to payment of his interest, because six months have not yet elapsed since it became due, but only three months. Nor have the principal moneys belonging to the plaintiff yet become due under his contract with the company. The plaintiff is entitled to have debentures in the form set forth in the schedule, but subject always to the terms of the trust deed. He is entitled to the benefit of that deed which gives him a charge on the property and assets of the company which are comprised in that deed. The form of the debenture gives the debenture-holder a more extensive charge than is given by the trust deed, but the principal moneys have not yet become due under condition 10 endorsed on the debenture. Suppose the plaintiff had got his debenture. He would have a charge on any assets of the company (if there were any such) not comprised in the deed, and if there were any such assets, he would stand in a better position, for he would now be entitled to a receiver as regards them, because his interest is in arrear, although he cannot yet enforce his charge upon the assets comprised in the deed. But there being in fact no other assets than those comprised in the trust deed, can the appellant come to the court and ask for the appointment of a receiver and manager, and thus override the terms of the trust deed, although he cannot yet enforce his charge upon the assets comprised in it? That would be not only in accordance with the contract, but against the contract. A

The plaintiff cannot under these circumstances be entitled to have a receiver appointed unless he can show that the assets of the company are in immediate danger. If it were proved that the assets of the company, subject to the plaintiff's security, were in danger of being lost, a case might have arisen for having the assets protected by the appointment of a receiver, even although he cannot yet enforce his security against them. I do not say that he could, but he might have that right. But upon the evidence I am not satisfied that any immediate danger threatens the assets. I do not think it plain on the face of it. I do not believe that there is any such immediate danger to the assets as would justify the court in appointing a receiver when the plaintiff is not entitled to it by his contract. That appears to me to dispose of the case, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs. B

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that counsel for the plaintiff has made it clear that, if the plaintiff could show that the assets of the company were in jeopardy, he would be entitled to have a receiver appointed of those assets. The case turns mainly upon the construction of certain documents. There has been a payment of money on the one side entitling the person who paid it to debentures of the company, and entitling him to the benefit of those debentures if not to the manual delivery of them. That gives him the actual right to be placed in the position of a debenture-holder. He will be clothed in equity with all the rights of a debenture-holder. Moreover, he is entitled to the benefit of the trust deed under which the debentures are issued, and his rights are subject to all its provisions. [His LORDSHIP discussed the provisions of the trust deed, and continued:] No right to payment of principal has yet accrued. As to interest, his interest has not yet been in arrear for six months. It becomes, therefore, a question of discretion. If this were a case of jeopardy to the assets comprised in the appellant's security, it seems to me that he would have the right to have a receiver appointed. But that is not made out. I think that, jeopardy not being made out, the court ought not to interfere. C

KAY, L.J.—In this case the plaintiff has taken debentures subject to a trust deed, which provides that the security is to be a floating security. The meaning of that is quite obvious to anyone acquainted with company law. The object of a floating security is that debenture-holders shall not be entitled to interfere with the property comprised in their security, until the events happen which are expressed in the deed. E

In the present case the interest has to be in arrear for six months to entitle the debenture-holders to enforce their security. The arrears in the present case are only for four months. The question is whether, under the circumstances, the court has power to put an end to the floating security. F

I come to the conclusion that, under certain circumstances, the court has that power, even although the six months have not yet expired, for the charge is an existing charge, and by means of the debentures he obtains the charge. If he came to the court and said, "it is true that the six months have not expired, but the company is dealing with its property in such a way as to practically jeopardise my security," the court might think proper to appoint a receiver. If a strong case of danger of that kind were made out, I think the court would have power to appoint a receiver. But the plaintiff has come to the court, not pledging his G

A belief that there is danger. He does not say that the property is in jeopardy; and the court does not infer danger. It seems to me that the decision of the court below was perfectly right. I think the application was premature, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Libel—Injunction—Interlocutory injunction—Restraint of publication of words complained of pending trial—Plea of justification.

E The court has jurisdiction in an action of libel to grant an injunction at any stage of the cause restraining the publication of the libel, but this jurisdiction should be exercised with great caution. Although the publication, if untrue, would clearly be libellous, an interlocutory injunction will not be granted where the defendant pleads justification unless the court can be sure that his defence cannot be sustained at the trial and that the plaintiff will receive more than nominal damages.

Appeal by the defendant, Perryman, one of two defendants in an action for libel, from an order of NORTH, J., granting a motion of the plaintiffs in the action for an interlocutory injunction, till trial of action, to restrain publication of the alleged libel.

On Jan. 10, 1891, the following paragraph appeared in the "Financial Observer":

"By the way, there appears a very peculiar connection between Marks Campbell and the gorgeous Mercantile and General Trust and Finance Company Unlimited, located in the sumptuous offices in Broad Street Avenue where the lovely Engel is on guard. We shall have a rare budget to say about this curious concern and those who are working the oracle." C

On Feb. 7, 1891, the article complained of by the plaintiffs as a libel appeared. It was headed D

"The Fletcher Mills of Providence, Rhode Island. The Providence and National Worsted Mills, Ltd. A Jews' Den. Marks' Promoting Vehicle."

The article stated that, in 1889, offices were taken by two Jews (the plaintiffs), who called themselves the Mercantile and General Trust, and had not a sixpence in the world, and got their office furniture on the hire system; that they managed to ingratiate themselves with the great H. H. Marks; that they had floated a company called the City of Baltimore United Breweries; that there was some very shady work in this transaction, and the plunder amounted to no less than £58,000; that in these concerns they were greatly assisted by a Bernard Engel, a brother of a moneylender in Great Marlborough Street, who knew the corners into which shares could be pushed, and had a large Jewish connection; that this Bernard Engel figured in Broad Street Avenue as D. Engel, and at times had varied his name into Engle, Angle, and Eagle, to meet different phases of promoting. The article proceeded: E

"Success has so far crowned their shady deeds, and having such a wonderful engine as the 'Financial News' at their disposal on terms, we next find them at work all together at Broad Street Avenue, where they flourish as the Mercantile and General Trust and Finance Co. This concern is composed of the following Jews—Bernard Engel, Gustave Richard Bonnard, Arthur H. Deakin, Edmund Campbell (alias Calischer, a member of the Stock Exchange), Harry Hananel Marks. The next bit of company promoting to come before the public is the Providence and National Worsted Mills, Ltd." F

The article then stated the prospectus of this company, described it as a gross fraud, and stated: G

"When our readers have carefully considered what a halo of picking and stealing surrounds the den in Broad Street Avenue, they will think twice before putting their hard earned savings into the pocket of these gentry." H

On Feb. 11, 1891, the writ in the action for libel was issued by the plaintiffs, Gustave Richard Bonnard and Arthur Henry Deakin, who carried on business as financial agents in Broad Street Avenue, under the name of the Mercantile and General Trust and Finance Co., against the defendants, Perryman, the publisher, and Allen, the printer, of the newspaper, the "Financial Observer and Mining Herald." The plaintiffs claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from selling, circulating, or communicating to any person any copy of the "Financial Observer and Mining Herald" of Feb. 7, 1891, or the article in any form, and I

- A from printing or publishing in that newspaper or otherwise any statement imputing to the plaintiffs or either of them in connection with the promotion or floating of Sykes Brewery or the City of Baltimore United Breweries as limited companies, or the promotion of the proposed Providence and National Worsted Mills, Ltd., or imputing or suggesting that the plaintiffs or either of them had bribed, suborned, or conspired with the proprietor or editor of the "Financial News" or any other newspaper, or any other person, or that they or either of them had been guilty of stealing or any other dishonest conduct. The plaintiffs claimed £5,000 damages.

On Feb. 13, 1891, the plaintiffs gave notice of motion for an interlocutory injunction, till trial of the action, in terms of the injunction asked for in the action.

- C In support of the motion the plaintiffs filed an affidavit stating categorically that they were not Jews, that their furniture was not procured on the hire system, that they had never had any communication whatever with H. H. Marks. They further denied all the other allegations in the article. The defendant, Perryman, in his affidavit swore that

- D "the whole of the allegations in the article complained of are true in substance and in fact and I shall be able to prove the same at the trial of the action by subpœnaing witnesses and cross-examination of the plaintiff, and by other evidence which I cannot, and which I submit I ought not to have to, produce on an interlocutory motion."

There was evidence that the defendant, Perryman, was in the habit of reprinting articles in the "Financial Observer" several times over, and that the number of Feb. 7, 1891, could be purchased at the office. The defendant, Allen, was proved to have printed the number of Feb. 7, 1891, though the defendant, Perryman, was described as printer and publisher on the back of the newspaper.

- E On the motion NORTH, J., made an interlocutory injunction against the defendant Perryman, the form of order being: to restrain, not the defendants and each of them, but the defendant Perryman, his servants and agents, until trial or further order, from selling, circulating, or delivering or communicating to any person or persons, or permitting to be sold or circulated, or delivered or communicated to any person or persons, any copy of the "Financial Observer and Mining Herald" of Feb. 7, 1891, containing an article headed "Fletcher Mills, Providence, Rhode Island," and from printing or publishing, or selling—repeating the previous words used—any copy of the said article, or any extract thereof, or material portion thereof, so far as such extract or portion affects the plaintiffs, or either of them.
- G The defendant Perryman appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and W. E. Vernon for the defendant.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Dunham for the plaintiffs.

- H April 21, 1891. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., read the following judgment in which LORD ESHER, M.R., and LINDLEY, BOWEN and LOPES, L.JJ., concurred: The plaintiffs in this case are two gentlemen carrying on business as financial agents under the title of the Mercantile and General Trust. The defendant Perryman is the printer and publisher of a paper called the "Financial Observer and Mining Herald." The defendant Allen is in some way (not material to ascertain) connected with the paper, and he appears to have printed the particular number which contains the matter of which the plaintiffs complain. In the number of Feb. 7, 1891, appeared the article which the plaintiffs assert to be a libel upon them, and in respect of which, having issued a writ in the Chancery Division, they applied for and have obtained from NORTH, J., the injunction which we are asked upon appeal to dissolve.

Two questions only is it really necessary to decide: (i) is there jurisdiction in the Supreme Court to issue an injunction to restrain the publication of an alleged libel, either at all, or before the libel has been adjudged to be such; and (ii) is this a case in which, as matter of discretion, the jurisdiction should be exercised, if it exists? The decision of the first question is, it is manifest, independent of the circumstances of any particular case; the decision of the second entirely depends upon them. As to the first, we are unable to entertain any doubt; the point is clear, and is settled by authority. The authorities, indeed, are few and recent, for very obvious reasons; but they are uniform, and they are clear. Prior to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, neither courts of law nor courts of equity could issue injunctions in such a case as this: not courts of equity, because cases of libel could not come before them; nor courts of law, because prior to 1854 they could not issue injunctions at all. But s. 79 and s. 82 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, undoubtedly conferred on the courts of common law the power, if a fit case should arise, to grant injunctions at any stage of a cause in all personal actions of contract or tort, with no limitation as to defamation. This power was, by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, conferred upon the Chancery Division of the High Court, representing the old courts of equity. Nevertheless, although the power had existed since 1854, there is no reported instance of its exercise by a court of common law till Sarby v. Easterbrook and Hannaford (1), which was decided in 1878.

In that case the injunction was not applied for, nor, of course, granted, till after a verdict and judgment had ascertained the publication to be a libel. That case was acquiesced in; and about the same time the Chancery Division began, and it has since continued, to assert the jurisdiction, which has been questioned before us, of granting injunctions on the interlocutory application of one of the parties to an action for libel. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Co. v. Beall (2) distinctly asserted the jurisdiction; and it was considered and established in an elaborate judgment of this court in Liverpool Household Stores Association v. Smith (3), in which CORRON, L.J., affirming indeed the refusal of KEKEWICH, J., to issue the injunction prayed for in that case, asserted the jurisdiction in plain language, and went on to explain the principles on which, in his opinion, the jurisdiction should be exercised. There have been other examples, but these are sufficient: and we do not doubt, upon the true construction of the statutes and upon authority, that, as matter of jurisdiction, NORTH, J.'s order might lawfully be made. But it is obvious that the subject-matter of an action for defamation is so special as to require exceptional caution in exercising the jurisdiction to interfere by injunction before the trial of an action to prevent an anticipated wrong. The right of free speech is one which it is for the public interest that individuals should possess, and, indeed, that they should exercise without impediment, so long as no wrongful act is done; and unless an alleged libel is untrue, there is no wrong committed; but, on the contrary, often a very wholesome act is performed in the publication and repetition of an alleged libel. Until it is clear that an alleged libel is untrue, it is not clear that any right at all has been infringed; and the importance of leaving free speech unfettered is a strong reason in cases of libel for dealing most cautiously and warily with the granting of interim injunctions. We entirely approve of, and desire to adopt as our own, the language of LORD ESHER, M.R., in William Coulson & Sons v. James Coulson & Co. (4) (3 T.L.R. at p. 846):

"To justify the court in granting an interim injunction, it must come to a decision upon the question of libel or not. Therefore, the jurisdiction was of a delicate nature. It ought only to be exercised in the clearest cases, where any jury would say that the matter complained of was libellous, and where, if the jury did not so find, the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable."

In the particular case before us, indeed, the libellous character of the publication is beyond dispute; but the effect of it upon the defendant can be finally disposed of only by a jury, and we cannot feel sure that the defence of justification is one which, on the facts which may be before them, the jury may find to be wholly unfounded; nor can we tell what may be the damages recoverable. Moreover, the

A decision at the hearing may turn upon the question of the general character of the plaintiff; and this is a point which can rarely be investigated satisfactorily upon affidavit before the trial—on which further it is not desirable that the court should express an opinion before the trial. Otherwise, an injunction might be granted before the trial in a case in which at the trial nothing but nominal damages, if so much, could be obtained.

B Upon the whole we think, with great deference to NORTH, J., that it is wiser in this case, as it generally and in all but exceptional cases must be, to abstain from interference until the trial and determination of the plea of justification. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed, and the order discharged; the costs in this court and in the court below to be costs in the cause.

C KAY, L.J.—I agree with all the members of the court that, since the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, by s. 79, s. 81, and s. 82 of that Act, the courts of common law had, and by s. 16 and s. 25 (8), of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, the High Court of Justice now has, undoubted jurisdiction to grant injunctions at or before the trial in actions of libel. I also agree that in such actions this jurisdiction should before trial be very cautiously exercised, especially because the questions of libel or no libel, and of the validity of a justification, if pleaded, are eminently matters to be determined by the verdict of a jury. The only point on which I have felt any difficulty is, whether it is expedient or right altogether to discharge the interlocutory injunction which has been granted.

[His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence in the plaintiffs' affidavits and the mode in which the defendant answered these affidavits, and continued:] By R.S.C., E 1883, Ord. 38, r. 3, it is provided that "affidavits shall be confined to such facts as the witness is able of his own knowledge to prove, except on interlocutory motions, on which statements as to his belief, with the grounds thereof, may be admitted."

LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Bidder v. Bridges (5) said (26 Ch.D. at p. 8):

F "I do not think this court can for a single moment give countenance to the notion that any common neglect, if there be such common neglect, of the provisions of that order can absolve persons from the consequences of disregarding them when the question is raised, as it is here raised, by a person having a right to raise it. That Order requires, in effect, that affidavit evidence as to matters of fact by a person who is not able strictly to prove them, must show not only the fact but also the grounds of his belief."

G To the same effect is the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in the Court of Appeal, in Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Co. v. Beall (2), where the injunction in a libel case was dissolved partly on the ground that the plaintiffs' affidavit did not comply with this order. Speaking for myself, I entirely agree with this view of the meaning and effect of the order, and think it essential to the

H ends of justice that it should be strictly observed.

In the case now before us the defendant's answer to the express and categorical denial by the plaintiffs of any kind of association with the person in question is only met by these statements as to the defendant's belief, which do not attempt to show the grounds of his belief otherwise than by stating that the association is through Engel or Campbell, and there is no other evidence in support of the defendant's case on this point. I agree that, in order to justify the court in granting an interlocutory injunction in such a case, there must be strong prima facie evidence that the statement is untrue. In my opinion, in this state of the affidavits, there is that strong prima facie evidence. If that is so, according to the ordinary practice, the court will be actuated in granting or refusing the injunction by the consideration of what is commonly termed the balance of convenience and inconvenience. To which side in this case does that balance incline? If this injunction be continued in the whole or in part, it will not prevent the defendant from protecting the public by any other statements he can legitimately make against the plaintiff; it will only prevent him from repeating this particular allegation. Even if at the trial the defendant should be able to adduce evidence showing that the plaintiffs' denial of their association with the person described as a swindler is untrue, it is impossible to conceive that the defendant can be damnified by being restrained meanwhile from repeating it. On the other hand, I can easily believe that this statement, if repeated, as the defendant admits he intends to do in the interval before the trial, may occasion very great injury, if not ruin, to the plaintiffs. If it should turn out at the trial of the action that the plaintiffs' denial on this point is true, and that the defendant's allegation is false, an irreparable injury may have been done to the plaintiffs by denying them this relief by interim injunction.

I think the true result of the affidavit evidence is, that the defendant has a suspicion of the plaintiffs' connection with the person whom he so defames, for which he is not able to allege any substantial foundation. For these reasons I should have granted the injunction, at least as to this part of the libel, and I should have been glad if the Court of Appeal had been prepared to sustain it.

DOBSON AND ANOTHER v. FESTI, RASINI & CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.), May 13, 14, 1891]

[Reported [1891] 2 Q.B. 92; 60 L.J.Q.B. 481; 64 L.T. 551;

Conflict of Laws—Contract—Performance in England—Contract between English firm and foreign partnership—Enforcement—Service on one partner of notice of writ out of jurisdiction—No appearance by partnership—Jurisdiction to enter judgment by default.

A partnership, all the partners of which were domiciled abroad, had no property, no place of business, and no manager, in England. The plaintiffs, machine manufacturers, were resident in England, and had supplied the partnership with machinery, the contract being one to be performed within the jurisdiction. The plaintiffs sued the partners in the firm name to recover an instalment due under the contract, and, having obtained leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction, served the notice on one of the managing partners abroad. No appearance having been entered at the expiration of the time limited for such requirement, the plaintiffs applied for leave to enter judgment in default of appearance.

Held: even though the cause of action was one to be performed within the jurisdiction within R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), and the plaintiffs had obtained leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction and such notice had been served on one of the partners, the partnership was a foreign firm which had been sued in the firm name, the rules of court as to suing partners did not apply, and the court had no jurisdiction to allow judgment to be entered in default of appearance.

- F Appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of the Divisional Court (CAVE and GRANTHAM, JJ.) refusing to allow the plaintiffs to enter judgment in default of appearance against the defendants who had, by leave, been served out of the jurisdiction.

- The plaintiffs were machine manufacturers residing in Lancashire, and the defendants were an Italian firm consisting of ten partners, all of whom were foreigners residing and domiciled abroad, and the defendant firm had no place of business, no property and no manager in England. Two of the partners, Giovanni Festi and Cesare Rasini were, by the deed creating the defendant partnership, appointed managing partners, with unlimited liability, and each of them was authorised separately to represent and bind the firm. The other eight partners, one of whom was the firm of Francesco Turati, and another the Banca Generale of Rome, were in the position of sleeping partners with limited liability, and could in no way represent or bind the defendant firm. The plaintiffs had supplied the defendant firm with machinery, and the defendant firm had failed to pay an instalment amounting to £3,151, being part of the price payable for the machinery delivered to them.

- I The plaintiffs in consequence brought this action against the defendants, who were sued in their firm name, to recover the £3,151 for goods sold and delivered, and the plaintiffs obtained leave from A. L. SMITH, J., under R.S.C., Ord. 2, r. 4, to issue notice of the writ of summons out of the jurisdiction, and to serve such notice on the defendant firm in Italy, the defendant firm being required to enter an appearance within sixteen days after service thereof. Nothing was said in this order as to how the service was to be effected. The plaintiffs served the notice of the writ in Italy on Cesare Rasini, one of the managing partners in the defendant firm. No appearance of any kind having been entered, the plaintiffs, on the expiration of the sixteen days after service, applied ex parte to the master at the Central Office to enter judgment in default of appearance. The master refused to do so, and an application by the plaintiffs that the master might be directed to enter judgment was refused by DENMAN, J., and subsequently by the Divisional Court. The plaintiffs appealed. A

Cur. adv. vult. B

May 14, 1891. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the refusal of a Divisional Court to give directions to the proper officer to allow the plaintiffs to sign judgment against the defendants upon default of appearance. The action, which was brought against the defendants in the name of the defendant firm, was for breach of a personal contract for goods sold and delivered. The members of the defendant firm are all Italian subjects resident abroad, and the defendant firm has no property, no place of business, and no manager in England. Nevertheless, leave was given to serve notice of the writ upon the defendant firm abroad. I do not say that that was irregular, as the defendants might have appeared, and I do not say if they had appeared that judgment might not have been signed against them. I think, however, that R.S.C., Ord. 9, r. 6, has no application unless the foreign firm choose to appear. That was the interpretation put on that rule by this court in Russell v. Cambefort (1), and by the majority of the Court of Appeal in Western National Bank of City of New York v. Perez, Triana & Co. (2). C

It has been ably and skilfully contended by counsel for the plaintiffs that the present case is different from those cases, because, in the present case, leave has been obtained under Ord. 11, r. 7, to serve notice of the writ abroad. That is very true, but it does not assist the plaintiffs unless the defendant firm chose to appear. Before the Judicature Acts there was no jurisdiction to allow a foreign firm to be sued in the firm name. Have the rules of the Supreme Court enlarged or extended the jurisdiction in that respect? In my opinion, they have done nothing of the kind. What the jurisdiction of the English court was with respect to the service of its process abroad, and the very circumscribed limit of that jurisdiction when permitted, is shown by Cookney v. Anderson (3) and Foley v. Maillardet (4), before LORD WESTBURY, L.C., and Drummond v. Drummond (5). Bearing in mind that the jurisdiction now contended for did not exist before the Judicature Acts, if we were to allow this appeal we should be putting a construction on the rules which, though verbally admissible, would be contrary to the general principles of international law. I think that was the ratio decidendi in Russell v. Cambefort (1), and, in my opinion, the reasoning there was correct, and was based on general principles of law. D

I think it would be a monstrous thing to allow a plaintiff in this country to obtain judgment in default of appearance against a foreign firm having no manager, no place of business, and no property in this country, by serving one of the partners of the foreign firm the other members of which might perhaps be in another part of the world altogether. It is nothing to the purpose to say that, according to Italian law, the process of the Italian courts could be so served. Counsel for the plaintiffs has, no doubt, the advantage of the wording of the rules in his favour, but one cannot on that account disregard the general principles of international law. In my opinion there is no jurisdiction to allow judgment to be signed in this case, and the appeal must be dismissed. E

LOPES, L.J.—In my opinion Ord. 9, r. 6, does not apply to a foreign firm none of the members of which are domiciled or resident here, unless the firm chooses to appear. In the present case the defendant firm is not domiciled or resident here, has no property here, and has not appeared. I am clearly of opinion that Ord. 9, r. 6, does not apply to this case, and that view is in accordance with Russell v. F

- A Cambefort (1) and Western National Bank of City of New York v. Perez, Triana & Co. (2). Counsel for the plaintiffs argued that the present case was distinguishable from those cases, because in the present case leave had been obtained to issue and serve notice of the writ abroad. But that does not assist the plaintiffs unless the defendant firm has appeared. I have only one further observation to make. Before the Judicature Acts it is clear there was no jurisdiction in a case like this, and jurisdiction cannot be said to be increased by the rules made under the Judicature Acts. These rules do not, and cannot, give the jurisdiction contended for.

- KAY, L.J.—I agree. How far the lex fori applies to foreigners is an important question. No doubt, if a foreigner sues in this country he must conform, and be taken to submit, to the lex fori. But the matter is altogether different when he is sued. Before the Judicature Acts, if a foreigner was sued as to certain kinds of property here, or land here, no doubt then, if he appeared, no difficulty would arise in proceeding against him. But there should have been personal service upon him, and he should have appeared. Here what has been attempted is this. A firm consisting entirely of foreign subjects, having no place of business, no manager, and no property here, have committed a breach of contract here, on account of which it is said they are brought within Ord. 11, r. 1 (e). It is said, there being jurisdiction (which is assumed), Ord. 11, r. 7, provides that notice in lieu of service shall be given in the manner in which writs of summons are served, and that you must, therefore, look back to the earlier rules and Orders as to that.

- So far, on the face of the rules, there is a great deal apparently in favour of the plaintiffs' contention. The foreign firm, however, is sued in their firm name—not as individuals—and leave has been obtained to issue and serve notice of the writ abroad on the foreign firm. One of the partners of the foreign firm has been found abroad, and notice of the writ has been served on him there, and Ord. 9, r. 6, has been relied upon as authorising this. The whole question is whether that rule applies to the case of an altogether foreign firm. In Russell v. Cambefort (1) the defendants were a foreign firm, which had a place of business here and a manager here. There had, however, been no breach of a contract to be performed within the jurisdiction, and, therefore, there was no jurisdiction under Ord. 11, by reason of the actual cause of action. But an action was nevertheless brought, and the writ was served on the manager of the defendants' place of business here. The Court of Appeal had, therefore, to consider Ord. 11, r. 6, and COTTON, L.J., held that it did not apply to a foreign firm at all and said (23 Q.B.D. at p. 528):

- “No doubt the rule in question is made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and that has been relied on as giving it as great an effect as an Act of Parliament; but although an Act of Parliament can give jurisdiction to the court against British subjects, as to foreigners Parliament has not, and does not assume to have, jurisdiction against those who are residing abroad and have not submitted to the jurisdiction of the English courts. Therefore, in construing the rule, we must have regard to what Parliament has the power to do, and in my opinion we should be wrong in construing it as giving jurisdiction against those who are in no way subject to the English Parliament; and although the rule does authorise service on one member of a partnership in general terms, yet it ought to be construed only as applying to partnerships the members of which, either by their nationality or residence, have become subject to English law and to the power of Parliament. Looking at it in that view I do not think the rule applies to firms consisting of foreigners who have in no way become subject to the English Parliament.”

If those words have any meaning at all they must mean that the thing there was wrongly done, not because the actual cause of action did not give jurisdiction, but because Ord. 9, r. 6, does not apply at all to a firm consisting of foreigners, even though having a place of business and a manager here.

In Western National Bank of City of New York v. Perez, Triana & Co. (2), A
BOWEN, L.J., referring to Russell v. Cambefort (1), said ([1891] 1 Q.B. at p. 316):

"The judgment of the Court of Appeal was, however, based expressly on the view that Ord. 9, r. 6, was not intended to govern writs directed against foreign firms none of whose partners were resident or domiciled in England";

in other words, he adopts what I think is the exact meaning of what was said by B COTTON, L.J., in Russell v. Cambefort (1). Unless, therefore, we are to overrule both these cases we must hold that Ord. 9, r. 6, does not apply at all to the present case, and if that be so, then Ord. 11 cannot give Ord. 9, r. 6, a different effect. I agree with LINDLEY, L.J., that it would be a strong thing that this rule as to service on partnership firms should apply to a foreign firm all of whose members are domiciled and resident abroad, and enable a plaintiff to sign judgment in default, after serving one of the partners of the foreign firm. I should be most C reluctant to give such a meaning to that rule, and, in my opinion, the matter is really decided by Russell v. Cambefort (1) and Western National Bank of City of New York v. Perez, Triana & Co. (2).

A sub-lease contained a covenant by the sub-lessor for quiet enjoyment of the premises by the sub-lessee without any interruption from or by the sub-lessor, and "any person . . . lawfully claiming by, through, or under him." The superior landlord obtained possession under the original lease which contained a covenant by the sub-lessor to repair and a proviso for re-entry on breach. The sub-lessee, who had performed all his covenants under the sub-lease, brought an action against the sub-lessor for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment in the sub-lease. H

Held: the interruption was caused by the superior landlord and not by the sub-lessor, or any person claiming by, through, or under him, within the meaning of the covenant, and, therefore, the action failed. I

Appeal by the defendant from the judgment of GRANTHAM, J., refusing to non-suit the plaintiff, in an action for breach of covenant in which the plaintiff recovered judgment for £500 damages at the trial of the action with a jury in Middlesex.

The defendant was the assignee of a lease of two houses, which contained a covenant to repair and a proviso for re-entry upon breach of that covenant. The plaintiff was the assignee of a sub-lease of one of the two houses granted by the predecessor of the defendant. The sub-lease contained a covenant by the sub-
 D lessor for quiet enjoyment in the following terms:

"That . . . the lessee or they paying the rent hereby reserved and observing and performing all the covenants, conditions, and agreements therein on his and their parts contained, shall and may peaceably possess and enjoy the . . . premises for the term hereby granted without any interruption from or by . . . the . . . lessor, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and any person
 E or persons whomsoever lawfully claiming by, through, or under him."

The defendant failed to perform the covenant to repair as to the house which was not demised to the plaintiff, and did not remedy the breach within a reasonable time after receiving notice from the superior landlord. The superior landlord thereupon brought an action against the plaintiff claiming to recover possession of the premises leased to him by the sub-lease, and recovered judgment and entered into possession. The plaintiff had observed and performed all the covenants in the sub-lease.
 F

The plaintiff thereupon brought the present action against the defendant to recover damages for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, and the plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment for £500. The defendant appealed on the ground of misdirection and applied for judgment or for a new trial.
 G

Crump, Q.C., and H. E. Duke for the defendant.
Herbert Reed for the plaintiff.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I think that, even without any authority to that effect, no other meaning can possibly be given to the words of this covenant, according to the ordinary meaning of the English language, than a meaning which does not make the defendant liable. The words "interruption by him" do not mean an interruption which has been caused because he has, by his conduct, given somebody else a right to turn the tenant out, and that is what has happened in the present case. The defendant, by his breach of covenant, gave the superior landlord the legal power to enter, and the superior landlord did enter. The actual interruption, therefore, was made by the superior landlord and not by the defendant. That being so, let us see if the words used in this covenant can include an interruption by the superior landlord.

These very words, or words as nearly like them as possible, were interpreted, in Stanley v. Hayes (1), many years ago, and it was held in that case that the words did not include an interruption, such as this, by the superior landlord. Even if we thought that case wrongly decided, as I do not, yet all leases since the year 1844 when it was decided have been drawn on the faith of that decision, and it ought not to be upset. It seems to me perfectly clear that the interruption in the present case does not come within any of the words of this covenant. The superior landlord is not a person claiming by, through, or under the lessor of the plaintiff. The proper interpretation of this covenant was legally settled long ago, and the plaintiff ought to have been nonsuited at the trial. This appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendant. A

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the question whether an interruption by the superior landlord is an interruption by his lessee, or whether the superior landlord can be described as a person claiming by, through, or under his lessee, I think that, according to the ordinary meaning of the English language, only one answer is possible, and that in the negative. It is quite true that the lessor's superior landlord did enter by reason of the default of the lessor, but that default does not make the superior landlord claim by, through, or under the lessor of the plaintiff. The only shadow of an authority in favour of the plaintiff is the passage in the judgment of BOWEN, L.J., in Harrison, Ainslie & Co. v. Muncaster (2), where he says ([1891] 1 Q.B. at p. 689): B

"I think that an interruption under such a covenant is not caused by the lessor or by those claiming under him, unless it is either a direct act of interruption, or unless it is some act of which it either was foreseen or ought by reasonable care to have been foreseen that the consequence in the particular case would be an interruption." C

I am not inclined to go so far as that definition goes, if it is to be considered as an affirmative definition. I do not, however, think that BOWEN, L.J., there meant to state affirmatively that everything which comes within that definition is an interruption, but only that nothing is an interruption which does not come within such a definition. In any case that which is said to be an interruption in the present case does not even come within that definition, because it could not necessarily have been foreseen that the superior landlord would enter. The plaintiff, therefore, ought to have been nonsuited at the trial, and this appeal must be allowed and judgment be entered for the defendant. D

LOPES, L.J.—I agree. In order to maintain an action upon a covenant for quiet enjoyment, drawn in a form like this covenant, an act done by the lessor himself or a person claiming under him must be proved. In this case that has not been proved. The only interruption proved was an interruption by the superior landlord. It is clear, therefore, that this interruption is not within the terms of the covenant in the plaintiff's lease. With regard to the passage cited from the judgment of BOWEN, L.J., in Harrison, Ainslie & Co. v. Muncaster (2) ([1891] 1 Q.B. at p. 689), I do not think that that definition, if pressed to the uttermost, will help the plaintiff in this case. The plaintiff ought to have been nonsuited, and this appeal must succeed. E

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case raises a question of some importance. A foreclosure decree was made in an action brought by two mortgagees, one of whom, being a solicitor, acted as such in the action for himself and his co-mortgagee. It is conceded that he is entitled to costs out of pocket, but he asks also for his profit costs. Is he right in that?

I will begin by taking the simplest case, that of a solicitor being sole mortgagee and acting as solicitor on his own behalf. What costs can he get? Only costs out of pocket, not because he is a trustee, but because the bargain is that the mortgagor may redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs, i.e., costs incurred by the mortgagee which do not include remuneration for his own personal trouble. We arrive then in that case at the same result and rule as in the case of a trustee. A Then comes a more complicated question. Does the rule apply where the solicitor acts not only for himself but also for his co-mortgagee? Unless the rule applies one of the mortgagees will be charging against the mortgagor a remuneration for his own personal trouble, and this ought not to be allowed.

There is no authority in favour of the plaintiffs except Re Donaldson (1), and there is a long course of practice against them. I do not think that the practice B has been so universal as I had supposed, but no doubt in many cases the point escaped attention. When, however, attention was called to it, as in Sclater v.
Cottam (2), the rule was recognised. Re Wallis (3) shows that the principle is settled that a mortgagee cannot charge a mortgagor for his own personal services about the security. As to Re Donaldson (1) it goes a great deal too far, and is inconsistent with the decision in Sclater v. Cottam (2). As to Craddock v. Piper C (4), LORD COTTENHAM decided that, where two trustees were parties to a litigation, and one of them being a solicitor acted for both, he was entitled to full costs.
But when we look at the judgment we find that his Lordship does not meet the difficulty arising from the double position of trustee and solicitor. The courts have repeatedly expressed doubts of the soundness of that decision. It came before us in Re Corsellis (5)—we did not overrule it, but we showed that we did not D approve of it. It stands, but it does not cover the present case. If we thought it sound in principle we ought to extend it to cases which, although different, fall within its principle; but the better opinion being that the decision is unsound, it ought not to be extended to any case not coming clearly within it.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree. I cannot follow the reasoning in Craddock v. Piper E
(4), and do not think it ought to be extended.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It was decided in Re Wallis (3), if it had never been decided before, that a solicitor who is sole mortgagee cannot get profit costs. Why, then, should he get profit costs if a layman is joined with him? Hibbert, who is joined with him, is not liable to him for any part of the costs, so the hardship F suggested by the plaintiffs does not arise. Craddock v. Piper (4), being a case of trustees, does not govern the present case, and I agree that it ought not to be extended.

B Mortgage—Redemption—Notice—Mortgage by deposit of deeds—No time limited for repayment—Right of mortgagee to six months' notice.

An equitable mortgagee by deposit of title deeds of land accompanied by a memorandum of deposit limiting no time for repayment is not entitled to six months' notice before accepting a tender of the amount due on the mortgage nor to six months' interest in lieu of notice.

C Where there is a regular mortgage deed with a proviso for redemption, the just inference from the transaction is that the loan on mortgage is intended to be of a permanent character, and it is reasonable to infer that the parties intended that, after default, the mortgagee should be entitled to a six months' notice; but where the just inference from the transaction is that the mortgage is merely temporary, as is the case where the mortgage is in the usual form by deposit merely, then it is not reasonable to infer that the parties intended so long a notice should be given.

Summons.

Fitzgerald, in order to secure an advance to him by the defendants, a firm of bankers at Godalming, deposited with them the title deeds of certain freehold property belonging to him, accompanied by a memorandum containing an undertaking to execute a legal mortgage on request. No time for repayment was limited by the memorandum, and no request was ever made for a legal mortgage in pursuance of it. The property was subsequently sold by arrangement between the mortgagor and mortgagees. The mortgagor became bankrupt, and the question arose as to what amount the bank was entitled to in respect of the advance to him, the bank claiming to be entitled to six months' interest on the amount of the loan in lieu of six months' notice before the tender of the borrowed sum. Cur. adv. vult. B

Jan. 21, 1892. CHITTY, J., read the following judgment.—The amount in dispute is small, but the question involves a matter of considerable importance. The question is whether an equitable mortgagee, by deposit of title deeds of land accompanied by a memorandum of deposit, is entitled to six months' notice before he is bound to accept a tender of the amount due, or six months' interest in lieu of notice. The memorandum in this case contains an undertaking by the mortgagor to execute a legal mortgage on request; but no request has been made, nor can any now be made, as the land has been sold pursuant to an arrangement between the mortgagor and the mortgagee. The undertaking, therefore, may be disregarded. The memorandum limits no time for repayment. The mortgagee has not called in the money, nor taken any steps to enforce his security. The mortgagee is willing to accept three months' interest only, but this is by way of concession. His claim is founded on his supposed right to six months' notice. C D

There are two authorities on the question of the right of a mortgagee to six months' notice or interest in lieu of notice. The first is Browne v. Lockhart (1). From the report, I gather that that case was one of a regular mortgage carrying the legal estate, with a proviso for redemption. In that case, SHADWELL, V.-C., after stating that it was the usual practice for a mortgagor when he intends paying off a mortgage to give a proper notice of his intention so to do, said (10 Sm. at p. 424) that he apprehended that there was no law of the Court of Chancery or any other court which required that to be done; that it rested entirely on custom; and that the custom was founded on this—namely, that it is but fair that the party who has lent his money on the security should have a reasonable opportunity before the transaction is put an end to of finding some other security on which he may lay out his money when it has been repaid to him. The observations of the Vice-Chancellor were, as I apprehend, addressed to the case which was before him of a regular legal mortgage, and I understand that he intended to affirm the right of the mortgagee in such a case to the usual six months' notice. The other authority is Smith v. Smith (2). In that case, the mortgage was of a reversionary interest in a trust fund, and it appears to have been made by a formal deed with the usual proviso for redemption. It was there held that the mortgagee was not bound to accept the money except on a six months' notice or payment of interest in lieu of notice. E F G

There is also the decision of MALINS, V.-C., in Bartlett v. Franklin (3), which, I understand, was also the case of a regular mortgage of a fund in court. It was there held that the mortgagee was entitled to six months' notice or interest in lieu of notice. There is no express authority, so far as I am aware, that the rule as to six months' notice or interest applies to the simple case of a mortgage by deposit of deeds. This form of security is now in very common use between bankers and their customers, and among commercial men and others where a temporary loan is required. It was admitted by counsel for the mortgagee that it is not the practice among bankers or commercial men to require six months' notice or interest; and, so far as my experience goes, this admission is in accordance with the fact. It was argued, however, for the mortgagee, that the rule existed although it was not insisted on. There was no evidence one way or the other as to the practice. I

The text writers state the rule, but not one of them intimates that it applies to a mortgage by deposit. I have referred to COOTE ON MORTGAGE, POWELL ON

A MORTGAGES, by COVENTRY, and FISHER ON MORTGAGES. In the first edition of COOTE, the rule is thus stated (p. 553):

"It has become a settled rule in equity that a mortgagor must, after default made by him in payment of the money according to the proviso in the mortgage deed, give the mortgagee six calendar months' notice of his intention to pay off the mortgage unless the mortgagee has demanded or taken any steps to compel payment; in which latter case, not any notice is requisite; and it has been considered that if the mortgagor be willing to pay six months' interest in advance, notice will be unnecessary."

The passage in POWELL and the note by COVENTRY are substantially to the same effect. FISHER states the rule thus (p. 1226):

C "After default, the mortgagee is generally entitled to notice before his security is discharged by payment, the reason of which is said to be that the mortgagor, having lost his estate at law, and being only entitled to redeem in equity, must do equity by allowing a reasonable opportunity for the mortgagee to find a new security for his money; for which six months is treated as the proper time. By a rule of practice the mortgagee is entitled to six months' interest in lieu of notice."

D One of the reasons given by FISHER and COVENTRY—viz., that the estate of the mortgagee has become absolute at law—applies only to a mortgage conveying the legal estate; the other given by the text writers—viz., that the mortgagee ought to have a reasonable time to find a fresh mortgage—would apply to a mortgage by deposit. But they all speak of the mortgagee's right after default. Where no time is limited for the repayment of the debt, as is almost universally the case E where the mortgage is by deposit, there is nothing to prevent the mortgagee from calling in his money at once, and it is inappropriate language, to say the least of it, to speak of the mortgagor being in default because he does not pay on the next day after the loan is made.

There being, then, no authority on the point, I must decide this question on principle; and, on principle, I think that an equitable mortgagee by deposit is not entitled to six months' notice. The true ground for the rule, where it applies, appears to me to be that it is equitable or, what is the same thing, reasonable to apply it. If I applied the rule to the case before me, I should be inflicting great hardship on persons who give such securities. Money is generally borrowed on them for a short time only, and often at a higher rate of interest, because it is G expected that the loan will shortly be paid off. Having regard to what has been and what has not been decided, I venture to express the rule thus:—Where the just inference from the transaction is that the loan on mortgage is intended to be of a permanent character, it is reasonable to infer that the parties intended that, after default, the mortgagee should be entitled to a six months' notice. That appears to be the just inference whenever there is a regular mortgage deed with H a proviso for redemption.

This point is covered by the authorities. But where the just inference from the transaction is that the mortgage is merely temporary, as I think is the case where the mortgage is in the usual form by deposit merely, then it is not reasonable to infer that the parties intended that so long a notice should be given. I do not say that the mortgagor may suddenly pounce down on the mortgagee without I any notice at all with the money, and demand back his deeds. He must not act unreasonably or vexatiously; he must at least give the mortgagee a reasonable time, though it may be short, to look up the deeds. Even the mortgagee, when the loan is payable on demand, must give a reasonable notice to the mortgagor to enable him to find the money: see Toms v. Wilson (4); and Brighty v. Norton (5). The circumstance that six months is always allowed to the mortgagor on a judgment, whether of redemption or foreclosure, has nothing to do with the question. The six months is allowed to the mortgagor as a reasonable time in which to find the money before his right to redeem is barred, whether by the dismissal of the action to redeem, or by the order making the foreclosure absolute. The rule, where it applies, does not seem to be founded on the length of time allowed for redemption by the proviso, which may be less than six months or may be more; sometimes the money is lent for a term of years. The period of six months is adopted as being generally reasonable, just as in the case of a tenancy from year to year, where the notice to determine the tenancy must be reasonable, and six months has long ago been established at common law to be the reasonable period. I will allow interest on the debt up to the date of actual payment, but no further interest in lieu of notice.

Company—Estoppel—Share certificate—False statement as to owner of shares—Liability of company to person acting on faith of certificate.

A transferee of shares in a company who has parted with the consideration money for the transfer on the faith of and in exchange for a certificate of proprietorship issued by the company under their seal is entitled to rely on the truth of the statement contained in it, and the company are estopped, in any action brought by the transferee in which that statement is material, from denying the truth of it and setting up a want of title in the person whom they have certified as owner. A transferor who has entered into a contract to deliver valid shares on the faith of a certificate of his ownership issued to him by the company is in the same position. There may, however, be cases in which the untruth of the statement in the certificate does not depend on any fact within the knowledge of the company as to which they have means of knowledge to which they reasonably ought to have recourse, and the person setting up the estoppel has equal means of knowledge, and in such a case no estoppel would exist.

I Appeal by the defendants in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES and KAY, L.JJ.), reported [1891] 2 Q.B. 614, affirming a decision of POLLOCK, B., in favour of the respondents in an action brought by them against the appellants company.

Finlay, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and Sutton for the appellants.

Reid, Q.C., and Hollams for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 20, 1893. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—This action was brought by the respondents, A Tomkinson and Price, who carried on business as stockbrokers in partnership, to recover damages in respect of the refusal by the appellant company to register the purchasers from the respondents of some shares in the appellant company. Pollock, B., who tried the action, gave judgment for the respondents for £717 10s., and this judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

The respondents, in December, 1888, advanced to one Powter the sum of £250 B by way of loan, on the faith of and in exchange for a transfer of 1,000 shares in the appellant company, which Powter deposited with the defendants as security for such advances. The transfer was what is termed a certified transfer—that is to say, it bore upon its face, above the signature of the secretary of the company, these words “certificate lodged.” There can be no doubt that the purpose of this certification is to give an assurance to the person taking the transfer that the C transferor has deposited with the company a certificate showing his right to transfer. The loan of £250 was paid off in January, 1889, and further loans were afterwards made from time to time on the faith and security of this certified transfer. In May, 1889, the respondent Tomkinson, with the knowledge and sanction of Powter, inserted his own name (as representing his firm) in the transfer as transferee of the shares, and having executed the transfer, lodged it at the office D of the appellant company for registration. On July 1, 1889, the appellant company, on the application of the respondents, issued to them a certificate signed by two of the directors, countersigned by the secretary, and sealed with the seal of the company, certifying that the respondent Tomkinson was the proprietor and duly registered owner of the 1,000 shares. In August, 1889, the balance due from Powter to the respondents was £193 14s. 6d., for which they held the 1,000 shares E as security. Powter then instructed them to realise for the purpose of paying his debt. The respondents, accordingly, in that month, sold the 1,000 shares to various purchasers for the sum of £426 17s. 6d., and, for the purpose of completing such sales, the respondents lodged with the appellants the certificate which had been issued in respect of the shares, together with transfers in favour of the F respective purchasers thereof, in order that they might be certified.

This having been done, the transfers, with the certification signed by the secretary of the appellant company upon them, were returned to the respondents and handed by them to the various purchasers, who thereupon paid their purchase money. Out of the £426 17s. 6d. thus received by the respondents they repaid themselves the balance of £193 14s. 6d. which remained due as already mentioned, and, after paying to Powter a sum of £110, they retained the balance of £123 3s., G Powter, who shortly afterwards absconded, being indebted to them to an amount largely in excess of that sum. The appellant company refused to recognise the certified transfers or to register the purchasers named therein as the holders of the shares. The respondents were consequently compelled, in accordance with the custom and rules of the Stock Exchange, to complete their contracts with the purchasers by purchasing and delivering to them 1,000 other shares in the appellant H company in the place of those named in the transfers. The market price of the shares having risen, the respondents were compelled to pay the sum of £717 10s. for such substituted shares, and it is the amount of this payment which they have been held entitled to recover.

From the evidence adduced at the trial it appeared that in December, 1887, Powter was the registered proprietor of a large number of shares in the appellant company. I In March, 1888, the company certified a transfer of £5,000 of these shares (of which the 1,000 which Powter purported to transfer to the respondents formed part) to Maitland and Balfour. A note of this was endorsed by the appellant company on the certificate of Powter's shares which was in their possession. In January, 1889, the company registered Balfour and Maitland as proprietors of the 5,000 shares, and gave them the usual certificate. It was under these circumstances that they refused to recognise the respondent Tomkinson as proprietor and to register his transferees. It was contended for the respondents that the

- A certificate which the respondent Tomkinson received from the appellant company was given to him for the purpose of being used by him as evidence of his title to the shares; that on the faith of this he entered into contracts of sale which he was bound to fulfil; that the appellant company were, under these circumstances, estopped from denying that he was the proprietor of the shares, and that, having refused to register the purchasers and transferees from him, on the ground that he was not the proprietor of them, they were liable to make good to him the loss he had sustained in consequence.

It was held by the Court of Queen's Bench, in Bahia and San Francisco Rail. Co. (1) that such an estoppel might arise where a certificate was issued, stating that the person named in it was the registered holder of certain shares in the company. The persons named in the certificate of the Bahia and San Francisco Rail. Co. having sold to a purchaser who was registered as holder, his name was afterwards removed on its being discovered that the transfer to the persons named in the certificate was a forgery. The court held that the giving of the certificate amounted to a statement by the company, intended by them to be acted upon by the purchasers of shares in the market that the persons certified as the holders were entitled to the shares; and that, the purchasers having acted on that statement by the company, they were estopped from denying its truth, and liable to pay as damages the value of the shares. BLACKBURN, J., in the course of his judgment, remarked that when joint-stock companies were established it was a great object that the shares should be capable of being easily transferred, and that the legislature had accordingly provided for the keeping of a register of the members, in order to keep which the company must alter the register whenever there was a transfer of its shares, and the learned judge drew attention to s. 31 of the Companies Act, 1862, which provided that a company might give certificates, and that these should be prima facie evidence of the title of the person named to the shares specified [see now Companies Act, 1948 (3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 452), s. 79 (1)], and pointed out that by granting the certificate the company make a statement that they have transferred the shares specified to the person named in it, and that he is the holder of the shares, and that, if the company have been deceived and the statement is not true, they may not be guilty of negligence, but they, and no one else, had power to inquire into the matter. The learned judge expressed the opinion that it was the intention of the legislature that these certificates should be documents on which buyers might safely act, and continued thus (L.R. 3 Q.B. at pp. 596, 597):

- G "It is quite clear that a statement of a fact was made by the company, on which the company, at the very least, knew that persons wanting to purchase shares might act. And, the claimants having bona fide acted upon that statement, and suffered damage, can they recover from the company? I think they can, on the principle enunciated in Freeman v. Cooke (2)."
- H The decision in the Bahia and San Francisco Railway Case (1) was followed under somewhat different circumstances by the Court of Exchequer in Hart v. Frontino and Bolivia South American Gold Mining Co., Ltd. (3). The plaintiff in that action bought and paid for shares in the defendant company, and received duly executed transfers and share certificates, which certified that the person named in the register of shareholders was the proprietor of five shares, numbered, etc. The seller of the shares, being afterwards compelled to pay a call upon them, demanded repayment from the plaintiff, who required to have the transfer completed by registration. His name was accordingly entered on the register, and he received from the company a certificate that he was the proprietor of the shares. On the faith of this certificate, he repaid the seller the amount of the call. The company having discovered that the shares had been sold by a previous owner by a duly executed transfer to another person removed the plaintiff's name from the register and inserted the name of that person. It was held that by the registration of the plaintiff and the delivery to him of the certificate, followed by the payment by him of the call, the defendants were estopped from denying his title to the shares, and were liable to pay for their value. A

The learned counsel for the appellants impeached these decisions, as they were entitled to do in your Lordships' House, and contended that they ought to be overruled. After carefully considering the able arguments urged at the Bar, I have no hesitation in expressing my concurrence in the law laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in the Bahia and San Francisco Rail. Co. Case (1). The reasoning of BLACKBURN, J., in pronouncing judgment in that case appears to me to be sound and in accordance with the law, and I think it would be very mischievous to cast any doubt on the authority of that case. B

The appellants argued, however, and correctly, that the present case is distinguishable from that in the Queen's Bench, inasmuch as it is not the purchasers who are seeking to render the company liable by way of estoppel, but the vendor of the shares, who himself received the certificate from the company. Does that, in the circumstances which your Lordships have to consider, make any difference? If the company must have known, as was said in the Bahia and San Francisco Railway Case (1), that persons wanting to purchase shares might act upon the statement of fact contained in the certificate, it must equally have been within the contemplation of the company that a person receiving the certificate from them might on the faith of it enter into a contract to sell the shares. The respondents did enter into such a contract, and thereby altered their position by rendering themselves liable to the persons with whom they contracted to sell the shares. All the elements necessary to create an estoppel would appear, therefore, to be present. C D

The appellants, however, relied upon the decision in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. (4) as showing that one who receives from a company a certificate that he is the proprietor of shares therein is not in the same position as regards his rights by estoppel against the company as a transferee from him would be. In that case Burge, who was the buyer of stock in the defendant company, received in pursuance of his purchase a transfer of the stock purporting to be executed by Coates, who was the registered owner of stock to the amount purchased. The transfer was, in fact, forged by a clerk in Coates's employ. Burge having borrowed money from a bank, the stock was transferred to Ingelow as trustee for the bank, and the company registered Ingelow as the owner, and issued a certificate accordingly. The advance having been repaid by Burge, the bank's trustee became trustee for him. The company having discovered the forgery and refused to recognise Ingelow as the owner of the shares, an action was brought by Burge and Ingelow to compel the company to recognise their title. It was held by the Court of Appeal that they had no title by estoppel as against the company. The grounds for the decision appear to have been twofold—in the first place, that Burge had not altered his position by reason of the statement in the certificate, and, in the next place, that he had himself, by producing to them a forged transfer, induced the company to insert the name of his nominee as the proprietor of the stock. E F G

Neither of these grounds apply in the case before your Lordships. I have already shown that the respondents did alter their position by entering into a contract which imposed liability upon them, and they did not in any way mislead the company into registering the respondent Tomkinson as a shareholder, and giving the certificate relied on. The company had certified the transfer to the respondents—that is, they had stated in effect that there was in their possession a certificate showing the title of Powter to make the transfer to them; they knew, and the respondents did not, that they had already certified a transfer of these very shares from Powter to Maitland and Balfour, and that the certificate referred to in their endorsement "Certificate lodged," bore on the face of it a statement showing that this was the case. I can see nothing, therefore, in the circumstances under which the respondents obtained the certificate to deprive them of the right to claim by way of estoppel against the company. H I

Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche (5), which was much pressed upon your Lordships in the argument for the appellants, appears to me to have no

A bearing on the question at issue between the parties to this appeal. The argument was put, as I understand, in this way. The company, it was said, are only authorised to issue a limited number of shares, and to hold it liable by estoppel, as is sought to be done in this case, to a person who is not the proprietor of any of those shares would in effect enable them to contract a liability in respect of shares beyond their authorised issue. I do not think this argument is a sound one. A
B person to whom the company is liable by estoppel to pay damages for refusing to register his transfer does not by reason thereof become a shareholder. Indeed, the very title by estoppel implies that he is not one. It has never been laid down, and is manifestly not the law, that a company is not authorised to employ its funds in paying damages for a wrong done, and, if his right by estoppel is established, the company have as much committed a wrong by refusing to register as shareholder
C the person whose title they deny as if his title to be registered had in fact been a good one.

It remains to consider whether the respondents are entitled to recover as damages the sum which they have had to pay in order to purchase shares to enable them to carry out their contract. It is certain that this expenditure became necessary because, and only because, the company refused to register the purchasers. But it
D is said that the sum thus expended is nevertheless not recoverable. It was argued that in respect of the refusal to register a transfer from him, a shareholder can recover nominal damages only. This may, no doubt, be so in some cases. In my opinion, it cannot be laid down as a proposition applicable to all cases that a person claiming by estoppel against a company is limited to nominal damages only in respect of the refusal to register a transferee from him. Again, it was said that
E the company have a certain discretion allowed them, and were not bound to register every person to whom a shareholder might choose to transfer his shares. This is also true, but in the present case the refusal was not based on any exception taken to the proposed transferees; it was grounded upon a denial of the title of the intending transferor, to whom a certificate of his proprietorship of the shares had been issued by the company. In such a case I can see no good reason why, if he
F can establish an estoppel against the company, he should not be entitled to recover the damages which he has in fact sustained owing to the refusal of the company to register. But it is contended that some deduction ought to be made from the sum of £717 10s. in respect of the amount received from the purchasers of the shares. I agree with the court below in seeing no ground for such a deduction. If the company had registered the purchasers of the shares (which in assessing the G damages it must be taken as against them they were bound to do) these moneys would equally have been received, and the £717 10s. would not have been expended. My Lords, for the reasons I have given, I think the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

H that the shares which Powter pretended to transfer to Tomkinson had at one time belonged to him, but he had parted with them, and other persons were on the register in succession to Powter at the time when Tomkinson sent in his transfer to the company, and received the certificate of July 1, 1889, from them. It also appeared that in regard to these and other shares in the company Powter had pursued a course of systematic fraud, which he was enabled to carry on for a time
I without detection by the help of some officials in the company's service who were in collusion with him, but it was established beyond question, and it is admitted by the appellants that Tomkinson and his firm acted throughout in good faith, and had no reason to suspect any want of good faith on the part of Powter. Under these circumstances POLLOCK, B., and the Court of Appeal held the company liable on the ground that they were estopped by the certificate of July 1, 1889, from denying that Tomkinson was the registered proprietor of the 1,000 shares in question.

The general principle of law relating to estoppel by representation cannot be questioned. It is, as LORD CRANWORTH observed in Jorden v. Money (6), a principle of universal application that if a person makes a false representation to another, and that other acts upon that false representation, the person who has made it shall not afterwards be allowed to set up that what he said was false, and to assert the real truth in place of the falsehood which has so misled the other. Then, after referring to some cases on the subject, his Lordship goes on to say (5 H.L.Cas. at p. 212):

"I think that the principle . . . may be carried much further; because I think it is not necessary that the party making the representation should know that it was false; no fraud need have been intended at the time. But, if the party has unwittingly misled another, you must add that he has misled another under such circumstances that he had reasonable ground for supposing that the person whom he was misleading was to act upon what he was saying."

There is no doubt, I think, in this case that the company must be taken to have known that the certificate was required by Tomkinson or his firm for the purpose of being acted upon. In fact, when the certificate was sent back to the company, and Tomkinson's transfers were sent in for certification, the company had express notice that the certificate was being acted upon. There is no difficulty in this respect. Nor is there, I think, any difficulty created by the circumstance that all the shares of the company were issued, and that the company could not have gone into the market to buy its own shares. The company are not asked to make good their representations by transferring shares to Tomkinson. They are called upon to pay damages in order to compensate Tomkinson for loss to which he has been put by reason of their misrepresentation. Nor do I think that it is any answer to Tomkinson's claim to say that he had a statutory right to inspect the register, and that if he had taken the trouble to do so he would have found out that Powter had no shares to transfer; and I agree to the measure of damages. The only difficulty that I have felt arises from the connection between Powter and Tomkinson in this relation, or assumed relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, and from the fact that Powter, acting or pretending to act on Tomkinson's behalf as well as on his own account, was instrumental in procuring the certificate of July 1, 1889, and that Tomkinson was an active, though unconscious, instrument of Powter's fraud. Whether under such circumstances a person ought to be permitted to rely upon a misrepresentation innocently made to which he has in a sense, and to a certain extent, contributed, is, I think, a matter not unworthy of consideration. The point, however, was not argued; the evidence bearing upon it was not sifted; and the attention of the learned counsel for the respondents was not called to it. It would not, therefore, be right for me to say more than that, in my opinion, there is nothing to prejudice the question if it should ever be raised, even under circumstances similar to those which have occurred in the present case. With this reservation I concur in the motion which has been proposed.

LORD FIELD.—I concur with my noble and learned friends in the conclusion at which they have arrived, that this appeal must be dismissed. It seems to me to be impossible, for the reasons which the Lord Chancellor has given, after the repeated and hitherto, I think, substantially unquestioned decisions with which he has so fully dealt, not to hold that a transferee of shares, who has parted with the consideration money for the transfer upon the faith of, and in exchange for, a certificate of proprietorship issued by a company under their seal, is entitled to rely upon the truth of the statement contained in it, and that the company are precluded, in any action brought by him in which that statement is material, from denying the truth of it, and setting up a want of title in the person whom they have certified as owner. I agree also in thinking that a transferor who has entered into a contract to deliver valid shares upon the faith of a certificate of his ownership issued to him by the company, is in the same position. The reasoning upon which the cases referred to proceed seems to me to be sound, and to be quite as applicable

A in the one case as in the other. I can, however, well understand that there may be cases in which the untruth of the statement is not depending upon any fact within the knowledge of the company as to which they have means of knowledge to which they reasonably ought to have recourse, and the person setting up the estoppel having equal means of knowledge, and having applied for and obtained the certificate upon an alleged transfer—I say there may be such cases in which no

B such estoppel may exist.

Such a state of things existed in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. (4), which has already been referred to. There the untruth of the certificate consisted in the fact that the signature to the transfer sent in for registration, which purported to be that of the person actually registered as holder in the company's register, had been forged, and, as BRETT, L.J., observed, that was a fact which lay

C as much within the knowledge of the applicant as of the company, and the certificate, as he says, did not contain a statement of facts which must have been known to the company, but were not known to the person to whom the representation was made, that case, therefore, differs widely from the present. Here the falsity of the representation depended upon the fact that Powter, the proposed transferor, was not, and had not been for some months, to the knowledge of the

D company, the registered owner of the shares which he purported to transfer, they having in the January preceding not only received a transfer from him to Maitland and Balfour, and entered it in their transfer book, but having actually registered Maitland and Balfour for the whole of the shares in question, and afterwards other persons for some of them. In Simm's Case (4) as in the present, no fraud was imputed to the applicants, and the learned judge who tried it also absolved all

E parties from negligence in the sense of want of reasonable care. But in the present case I cannot acquit the appellants of a certain amount of negligence or want of due care, for all that was requisite to ascertain the defect was a reference to the share register, the duty of keeping which is thrown upon the company by statute.

In Simm's Case (4) the Court of Appeal held, and I agree with them, that there was no duty upon the company to inquire of a registered holder whether the

F signature was genuine, although it was the practice of the company to do so. But I do think that before affixing the seal of the company and the signature of the directors to a representation which they know that the applicant requires as evidence of title upon which he may go into the market and make contracts of sale according to the regulations of the Stock Exchange involving the duty of making a complete delivery of genuine shares, it is at least the duty of a company to

G ascertain by reference to their own register, whether the proposed transferor appears to be the holder of the shares which he purports to transfer. It was in evidence that it was the practice for companies to do so. In sending in a transfer to a company for registration, it does not appear to me that the applicants give any warranty, or even make a material representation to the company that the transferor is the registered holder of the shares. That is a fact of which, in the

H ordinary course of business at the time when the transferee would part with his money he would not only have no knowledge, but no reasonable means of knowledge; whereas the company, who are under an obligation to grant or refuse the certificate, with ample time to refer to their own documents of title, have all the means of knowledge in their own office. That is a duty which I think they owe to a person who is desirous of becoming a member of their body and wishes to

I ascertain whether he may safely rely upon his admission as such, and to be fortified with an assurance by the company to that effect.

It is of course true in this case, as in Simm's Case (4), that the respondents were the persons who sent in the transfer to the appellants for registration and certificate; and in that sense, and to that extent, they may be said to have induced its issue. But I cannot come to the conclusion that in so doing they in any way induced the appellants to believe that Powter was the registered holder, or that the appellants were induced by them to make the false representation contained in the certificate. The respondents' relations with Powter were no doubt those of principal and agent;

but I can see no substantial ground for inferring that those relations in any way made the respondents responsible for Powter's frauds. No fraud on their part was imputed to them, and it was expressly negatived by the learned judge who tried the case. And to hold that a proposed transferee, who innocently sends in a transfer from a person appearing upon a certificate to be the registered owner, is deprived of the value of the assurance contained in the certificate, would, I think, very much tend to reduce the value of what seems to me to be a very important link in a man's title. There is also no doubt that in the present case the sales which were made by the respondents upon the faith of the certificate, were made by the order of Powter.

I arrive, therefore, at the result that the judgment of the Court of Appeal must be affirmed, and I am unable to come to the conclusion that there is anything in the conduct of the respondents to bring them within any authority or principle of equity which ought to prevent them from relying upon the estoppel which they set up, the maintenance of which in general, in the case of sellers as well as buyers, is, I think, in conformity with principles of equity and most essential to the conduct of the vast transactions in shares of registered companies which daily take place in this country. If, therefore, the estoppel exists, as I think it does, how does it operate in favour of the respondents? The breach of duty which they substantially allege is a refusal to register their transferees under circumstances which, as I hold, preclude the appellants from denying the respondents' ownership of the shares. If the latter had been such proprietors they would have had a right to require the appellants so to register, and the refusal to do so was, therefore, as against the respondents, upon the assumption of fact which the appellants were precluded from denying, in my opinion an actionable wrong in respect of which the respondents are entitled to recover damages.

The measure of those damages is, I think, the same which they have had to pay to enable them to carry out the contracts into which they entered upon the faith of the assurance given to them by the certificate. The moneys which they received upon their own sales were not in any sense received to the use of the appellants. Upon the assumption which the estoppel creates as against the appellants that the certificate was well founded, that money was properly received by the respondents, and I do not see how the appellants can recover it back in the shape of deduction from the £717 10s. which the respondents would not have had to pay in that view of the case. It was argued that the appellants were not liable because, as a corporation, they could not exceed their powers by registering stock which was already registered in the names of other proprietors, and if this had been an application to compel them to do so, or to purchase other stock of an equal amount, that might have been so. But this is an action to recover damages for a wrong to which no such principle can apply any more than to other breaches of contract or duty of which they might have been guilty.

A person occupying a fiduciary position who has property deposited with him as a result of that relation is to be dealt with as an express, and not merely a constructive, trustee of the property.

Accordingly, where a solicitor to trustees of a will invested trust money in an equitable mortgage by deposit of deeds, and, when the mortgagor paid off the mortgage, retained part of the money instead of paying it to the beneficiary,

Held, in an action against the solicitor by the beneficiary's daughter, who at his death had become absolutely entitled to the money, that the solicitor was in the position of an express trustee of the money, and could not avail himself of the defence of the limitation of the action provided by s. 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888.

Notes. By s. 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, a trustee, in an action against him, was given all rights and privileges conferred by any statute of limitations except where the claim against him was founded on a fraud or fraudulent breach of trust or to recover trust property retained by him. This section was repealed by the Limitation Act, 1939, its effect being re-enacted in s. 19 of that Act.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of DAY, J., at the trial of the action without a jury at Nottingham. E

The plaintiff was the surviving trustee and also the cestui que trust, under the will of Joseph Soar, and the defendant was the widow and executrix of one Ashwell, who had been solicitor to the trustees of the will. The action was brought for an account of moneys received by Ashwell in the following circumstances. Joseph Soar died in 1859, and the whole of his estate was distributed with the exception of a sum of £256, which was held by the trustees of his will upon trust for two persons during their respective lives and after the death of each his share was in trust for his children. This sum, with other moneys belonging to different trusts, Ashwell, as solicitor to the trustees, invested upon an equitable mortgage by deposit of deeds. In January, 1879, the mortgagor paid off the mortgage, and paid the £256 to Ashwell. The tenant for life of one half of this sum having died, Ashwell paid £128 to his children, who were absolutely entitled to it; the remaining half, i.e., £128, remaining in Ashwell's hands. In November, 1879, Ashwell died. His affairs were wound-up by his managing clerk, and the plaintiff's father, who was entitled to the interest of £128 during his life, was paid such interest regularly every half year up to January, 1886. On July 5, 1886, the plaintiff's father died, and the plaintiff became absolutely entitled to the £128, the remaining half of the £256. No interest was paid after January, 1886. On Feb. 21, 1891, this action was commenced. At the trial of the action before DAY, J., without a jury, the learned judge held that the claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and he gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed. F

Cur. adv. vult. I

Aug. 10, 1893. The following judgments were read.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case there was no such relation between the plaintiff and the deceased Ashwell as would entitle the plaintiff to maintain against Ashwell's executors an action at law in respect of the complaint he makes. The

A relief he demands is the subject solely of a suit or action in equity. The only way in which the plaintiff can validly state his demand in equity is to assert that Ashwell was a trustee of money now claimed by the plaintiff, which, if the trust were observed, must necessarily have come to the plaintiff, and that Ashwell committed a breach of trust by misappropriating the money which was in his hands, as a trustee of the trust, to his own use. If Ashwell did this thing, he must have done so before November, 1879, when he died. If there was the trust asserted by the plaintiff, the breach of it relied upon by the plaintiff must have happened—and it is the cause of the plaintiff's action, if any—before November, 1879. If the Statute of Limitations is applicable, it is fatal to the plaintiff's right to recover.

In order to determine whether a statute of limitations applies or not to a cause of action before the court, the court must first determine what is the cause of action relied on. The court must do so in order to see whether it is an action of a class to which the statute in question applies. If the action is of a class within the statute, then the court must determine whether the alleged breach, if any, occurred beyond the time of limitation. If the alleged breach, if it occurred at all, must have occurred beyond the time of limitation, the court will not further inquire whether the breach did or did not in fact occur. The plaintiff's right to relief is barred. The questions in this case, therefore, are: Was Ashwell a trustee of the money now claimed by the plaintiff within a meaning of the word "trustee" attributed to it in equity? and Was he such a trustee as a court of equity will not allow to rely on the statutes of limitation? If there is created in expressed terms, whether written or verbal, a trust, and a person is in terms nominated to be the trustee of that trust, a court of equity, upon proof of such facts, will not allow him to vouch a statute of limitations against a breach of that trust. Such a trust is in equity called an express trust. If the only relation which it is proved the defendant or person charged bears to the matter is a contractual relation, he is not in view of equity a trustee at all, but only a contractor; and equity leaves the contractual relation to be determined by the common or statute law. If the breach of the legal relation relied on, whether such breach be by way of tort or contract, makes, in the view of a court of equity, the defendant a trustee for the plaintiff, the court of equity treats the defendant as a trustee become so by construction, and the trust is called a constructive trust; and against the breach which by construction creates the trust the court of equity allows statutes of limitation to be vouched. There are cases not falling strictly within either of those thus enunciated, some of which have been treated by the courts of equity as within the class in respect of which a statute of limitations will not be allowed to be vouched, and some within the class in respect of which such a statute may be vouched. It must obviously be unnecessary on this occasion to state exhaustively all the different cases. It suffices to determine in which class is the present case.

It is not in the first enunciated case. There was an express trust created, but Ashwell was not at any time nominated as a trustee of that trust. He was the solicitor of the nominated trustees. As such solicitor he was entrusted by the nominated trustees to take and have in his hands the trust money, with a direction on their behalf to deal with it according to the terms of the trust. Assume that he misappropriated that money to his own use, and that that was all; the misappropriation would at once of itself make him the holder of the money in trust for the rightful owner, but, if that were all, only a trustee by construction of a constructive trust. But the questions in this case are whether Ashwell was not, in view of a court of equity, a trustee of the money before the alleged breach by misappropriation, and, if he was, under which class of trust he was with regard to limitations. The moment the money was in his hands, he was in a fiduciary relation to the nominated trustees: he was a fiduciary agent of theirs; he held the money in trust to deal with it for them as directed by them; he was a trustee for them. He was, therefore, a trustee of the money before he committed, if he did commit, the alleged breach of trust, and was in possession of and had control over the money before he committed, if at all, the alleged breach of trust.

The cases seem to me to decide that, where a person has assumed, either with or without consent, to act as a trustee of money or other property, i.e., to act in a fiduciary relation with regard to it, and has in consequence been in possession of or has exercised command or control over such money or property, a court of equity will impose upon him all the liabilities of an express trustee, and will class him with and will call him an express trustee of an express trust. The principal liability of such a trustee is that he must discharge himself by accounting to his cestuis que trust for all such money or property without regard to lapse of time. There is another recognised state of circumstances in which a person not nominated a trustee may be bound to liability as if he were a nominated trustee, namely, where he has knowingly assisted a nominated trustee in a fraudulent and dishonest disposition of the trust property. Such a person will be treated by a court of equity as if he were an express trustee of an express trust.

The propositions thus enunciated seem to me to follow the judgments of LORD HATHERLEY and GIFFARD, L.J., in Burdick v. Garrick (1) and of LORD SELBORNE in Barnes v. Addy (2). Where, in cases decided by judges as judges both of fact and law, you can collect the principle of law on which they have all assumed to act, it seems to me unnecessary to determine, though it is useful to consider, whether one would have applied that principle of law to the facts in the same way that any particular judge did in the case before him. I am of opinion that the present case is within the description of that which is treated as and is called in equity an express trust, and that the inquiry as to the alleged breach cannot be stopped by the Statute of Limitations. I am clearly convinced by the evidence that Ashwell became on receipt of the money a trustee of it, and that, as he has not been shown to have accounted for it, the defendant, his executrix, is liable as such for a breach of trust by him.

BOWEN, L.J.—It appears to me to have been in the present case clearly shown that the deceased husband of the defendant, who is the representative of his estate, was during his lifetime solicitor to the trustees, of whom the plaintiff is one besides being a beneficiary under the will; that, while acting as such solicitor, the deceased was entrusted with the custody of some of the trust moneys; and, lastly, that such trust moneys have never been repaid. The question, therefore, arises whether the claim of the plaintiff can be barred through lapse of time by analogy to the Statute of Limitations. That time (by analogy to the statute) is no bar in the case of an express trust, but that it will be a bar in the case of a constructive trust is a doctrine which has been clearly and long established.

It was argued on behalf of the defendant that the present was the case of a constructive trust only, and the learned judge below appears so to have thought. On the decision of the question whether this is the case of an express or only of a constructive trust, the present appeal appears to hang. An express trust can only arise between the cestui que trust and his trustee. A constructive trust is one which arises when a stranger to a trust already constituted is held by the court to be bound in good faith and in conscience by the trust in consequence of his conduct and behaviour. Such conduct and behaviour the court construes as involving him in the duties and responsibilities of a trustee, although, but for such conduct and behaviour, he would be a stranger to the trust. A constructive trust is, therefore, as has been said, "a trust to be made out by circumstances." It is not unreasonable that in the latter class of cases, where the liability of a stranger to the trust arises from his conduct and depends on the proof of his contemporary acts, time should run in favour of the person to be charged. In such cases conflicts of evidence are possible or probable, and to deny to the person to be charged the shelter or benefit of a period of limitation would be obviously dangerous and unjust.

Although this general principle of justice has been authoritatively laid down in courts of equity, there has been some variety and inconsistency, both in the language used about constructive trusts and in the line of demarcation that has been

- A drawn between the cases of express and constructive trusts. First, the doctrine that time is no bar in the case of express trusts has been extended to cases where a person who is not a direct trustee nevertheless assumes to act as a trustee under the trust: Life Association of Scotland v. Siddal (3). This extension of the doctrine is based on the obvious view that a man who assumes without excuse to be a trustee ought not to be in a better position than if he were what he pretends.
- B Secondly, the rule as to limitations of time, which has been laid down in reference to express trusts, has also been thought appropriate to cases where a stranger participates in the fraud of a trustee: Barnes v. Addy (2). Thirdly, a similar extension of the doctrine has been acted on in a case where a person received trust property, and dealt with it in a manner inconsistent with trusts of which he was cognisant: Lee v. Sankey (4). Fourthly, in some other cases—e.g., in Bridgman v. Gill (5), by LORD ROMILLY, and in Wilson v. Moore (6), by LORD BROUGHAM—language has been employed in regard to the question of limitations of time in certain instances of constructive trust which can scarcely be reconciled with the language held in Bonney v. Ridgard (7); Beckford v. Wade (8); Townsend v. Townsend (9), and in other cases.

- It is not necessary in the present appeal to discuss the somewhat fluctuating expressions that can be discovered in equity authorities on the subject of constructive trusts. One thing seems clear. It has been established beyond doubt, by authority binding on this court, that a person occupying a fiduciary relation, who has property deposited with him on the strength of such relation, is to be dealt with as an express, and not merely a constructive, trustee of such property. His possession of such property is never in virtue of any right of his own, but is coloured from the first by the trust and confidence in virtue of which he received it. He never can discharge himself except by restoring the property, which he never has held otherwise than upon this confidence: Chalmer v. Bradley (10); Marquis of Cholmondeley v. Lord Clinton (11); and this confidence or trust imposes on him the liability of an express or direct trustee.

- The principle which clothes those who receive property in their fiduciary position with the liabilities of express or direct trustees was clearly laid down in Burdick v. Garrick (1). LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., said (5 Ch. App. at pp. 240, 241):
- F

"I do not say that in every case in which a bill might be filed against an agent the Statute of Limitations would not apply; but in all cases where the bill is filed against an agent on the ground of his being in a fiduciary relation, I think it would be right to say that the statute has no application."

- G GIFFARD, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 243):

"I do not hesitate to say that, where the duty of persons is to receive property, and to hold it for another, and to keep it until it is called for, they cannot discharge themselves from that trust by appealing to the lapse of time."

- H It is with reference to this language that KAY, J., said, in Banner v. Berridge (12) (18 Ch.D. at p. 264):

"That obviously enlarges the definition which KINDERSLEY, V.-C., gave [in Petre v. Petre (18), 1 Drew. at p. 393], and points out that a man may be bound by an express trust where moneys, which in no sense belong to him, and in which he has no kind of interest, or goods, plate, or jewels, are placed in his hands by the real owner as deposittee of them, and that without any writing or even expression in words that it was to be a trust. That would come, according to LORD HATHERLEY's dictum here, within the definition of express trust."

- I This view was followed by WICKENS, V.-C., in Gray v. Bateman (13), and by CHITTY, J., in Re Bell, Lake v. Bell (14), and has never since been impeached. In Re Sharpe (15), recently before the Court of Appeal, the principle was applied to the case of directors of a company who had improperly parted with the assets of a company. FRY, L.J., said ([1892] 1 Ch. at p. 172): A

"Where money has found its way into the hands of a trustee or other person against whom this court gives the same relief as against a trustee, there the trustee, or the person in a fiduciary position, cannot set up the Statute of Limitations or the analogy of the Statute of Limitations as an answer to the demand for money, which was in his hands." B

When we turn to the facts of the present appeal, the case is one which obviously falls within this category or class. The deceased solicitor was the solicitor, not of the cestuis que trust but of the trustees. To such trustees, however, he stood in a fiduciary relation, and on the strength of it received property from them. What he received from his own clients he received under a trust to them. Whether his estate is liable after this lapse of time on the ground of an express trust between himself and the original cestuis que trust becomes unimportant, since his estate remains clearly liable on this ground to his own clients, the trustees, one of whom is plaintiff, and, indeed, this liability is one of which the original cestuis que trust under the trust would be entitled to the benefit in a properly constituted suit, not because the defaulter was their own trustee, but because he was bound under a direct trust to persons who were the trustees. C

On this simple ground, whatever other law or equity may or may not be applicable to the matter before us, whatever may be the limitations or definitions to be introduced into the doctrine of the Statute of Limitations and constructive trusts, this case (which is one of express or direct trust) lies outside them all. I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed, and that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed with costs both here and below. E

KAY, L.J.—This action is brought by the surviving trustee under a will, who is also the cestui que trust, against the representative of a deceased person named Ashwell, who was solicitor to the trust, claiming an account of part of the trust fund received by him. Under the trust a sum of £256 was held for two persons for their respective lives, and after the death of each his share was in trust for his children. This sum of £256 Ashwell, as solicitor to the trust, invested, with other moneys belonging to different trusts, upon an equitable mortgage by deposit of deeds, apparently in his own name. In January, 1879, this mortgage was paid off, and the £256 was paid by the mortgagor to Ashwell. One moiety of this sum was distributed, the tenant for life of that moiety having died, among his children, who were absolutely entitled to it. What became of the other moiety—£128—does not clearly appear; but it was not paid to the trustees or invested in their joint names, and, therefore, Ashwell, it must be inferred, retained it in his own hands. Ashwell died in November, 1879. The tenant for life of this moiety died on July 5, 1886. Thereupon the plaintiff became entitled to it absolutely. The interest had been paid during the life of the tenant for life by a clerk of Ashwell's, who was employed in winding-up his business. Whether such payments were made by any authority of Ashwell's representative, which would prevent the Statute of Limitations running, is not very clear. This action was begun on Feb. 21, 1891, twelve years after Ashwell had received the mortgage-money, but within six years after the death of the tenant for life, when the plaintiff's title as cestui que trust vested in possession. The defendant, who is the legal personal representative of Ashwell, pleads the Statute of Limitations. F
I

The first answer made to this is that Ashwell was an express trustee of the fund. Generally speaking, a person who is not the appointed trustee, and whom it is sought to affect with a trust by reason of his conduct is not a trustee at all, although he may be liable as if he were; which is commonly expressed by saying that he is not an express but a constructive trustee. An express trustee, prima facie, is a trustee appointed by the author of the trust, or under a power created by him, or by the court under the Trustee Act. But, where the case is that it is

- A sought to affect a stranger, or to make him responsible as a trustee, that must be by evidence of facts not contained in the original declaration of trust. One of the reasons for the distinction between an express trust and a trust raised by implication of law upon external facts of that kind is that the lapse of time, which may have destroyed important evidence, renders it unjust to take such a case out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations. Here the trust is expressed by the
- B will, and no external evidence is wanted to establish that. But, it may be argued, such evidence is requisite to make out that Ashwell was bound by the trust, of which he was not an appointed trustee, and, therefore, this reason for the distinction appears to apply to this case. Ashwell is dead. His evidence might have been conclusive against the claim. He might have disproved all the facts relied on to make out that he was a trustee. For instance, he might have proved that
- C he never received the money, or that, having received it, he paid it over to the trustees. Ought he not to be considered only constructively a trustee, and is not the statute on this ground a proper defence?

In Townsend v. Townsend (9) LORD COMMISSIONER ASHURST says (1 Cox, Eq. Cas. at p. 34):

- D "As to trusts being an exception to the Statute of Limitations, the rule holds only as between trustees and cestuis que trust; it is true that a trustee cannot set it up against his cestui que trust; but this is merely the case of a trustee by implication, and as such affected by an equity; but that equity must be pursued within a reasonable time."

- E This language is quoted by SIR WILLIAM GRANT in Beckford v. Wade (8), a case in the Privy Council, and SIR WILLIAM GRANT adds (17 Ves. at p. 97):

- F "It is certainly true that no time bars a direct trust as between cestui que trust and trustee; but, if it is meant to be asserted that a court of equity allows a man to make out a case of constructive trust at any distance of time after the facts and circumstances happened out of which it arises, I am not aware that there is any ground for a doctrine so fatal to the security of property as that would be; so far from it, that not only in circumstances where the length of time would render it extremely difficult to ascertain the true state of the facts, but where the true state of the facts is easily ascertained, and where it is perfectly clear that relief would originally have been given upon the ground of constructive trust, it is refused to the party who, after long acquiescence, comes into a court of equity to seek that relief."

- G The authorities do not seem to have drawn with any precision the line of distinction between express and constructive trusts. In Townsend v. Townsend (9) land was conveyed in 1701 to trustees, to the use of the settlor for 500 years, and subject thereto to A. for life, with a proviso that, if A. paid a life annuity to the settlor and £500 to his executors, the term should be void. The settlor died,
- H having bequeathed the £500 to his daughter. A. paid £500 to the settlor's executrix, who assigned the term to a trustee for A.; and after his marriage, A., in 1708, settled the term, with the concurrence of the trustee of it, by assigning it to other trustees upon trust for himself for life, remainder to his wife for life, remainder to their children. Subsequently, by a deed in 1739 and a fine, A. conveyed the lands to other uses in favour of the defendants, and the term was
- I assigned by the surviving trustee to attend, on the ground that this deed defeated the deed of 1708. The plaintiff claimed the benefit of the term under the deed of 1708; but, as his claim was not made till twenty years after his title accrued, the bill was dismissed on the ground that the defendants were merely trustees by implication.

In Bonney v. Ridgard (7), stated by SIR WILLIAM GRANT, leasehold property was bequeathed in trust for the testator's children. The executrix sold it to a purchaser who had notice of the will under circumstances which satisfied the judge that the sale was a gross fraud on the part of both vendor and purchaser; but LORD KENYON refused to "turn the defendants into trustees" because of the lapse of time, acting by analogy to the Statute of Limitations. In Wilson v. Moore (6), merchants, by direction of an executor, applied moneys, to which they knew he was trustee, in discharge of his private debt to them; and it was held by LORD BROUGHAM, L.C., affirming the judgment of SIR JOHN LEACH, that having concurred in this breach of trust, they could not rely on the lapse of six years as a bar to the claim against them; they must be held to be trustees, and time would not run. In Life Association of Scotland v. Siddal (3), a person, who was not actually trustee of a will, assumed to act and acted as though she were trustee. TURNER, L.J., said (3 De G.F. & J. at p. 72):

"If she had by writing declared herself to be a trustee, the trust in her could not have been otherwise than express, and her conduct is equivalent to her written declaration."

In Bridgman v. Gill (5), bankers transferred money from a trust account to the account of the tenant for life, who was indebted to them, in order to pay that debt, and it was held that, having been parties to this breach of trust, they could not avail themselves of the Statute of Limitations in answer to a claim by the trustees against them.

In Robertson v. Armstrong (16) the cestui que trust under a settlement of a fund sued the original trustees of a will, under which the fund was derived, and the solicitors of his own trustees of the settlement, who by direction of such trustees had received the fund and misapplied it, making such last-mentioned trustees also parties, and praying that the original trustees of the will and the solicitors of the settlement trustees might be ordered to pay the fund to the settlement trustees. The Master of the Rolls held that the will trustees were completely discharged by the payment to the solicitors of the settlement trustees, that the solicitors could only be made liable through the settlement trustees, and that they could not be reached in that form of suit, and he dismissed the bill. No question of the Statute of Limitations seems to have been raised; but the decision is important, because it shows that the proper suit is by the trustees against their agent, or by the cestuis que trust against both the trustees and their agent, seeking to make both liable.

In Lee v. Sankey (4), a firm of solicitors were employed by the trustees of a will to receive the proceeds of a real estate taken by a railway company. They received the money, and paid it in various sums from time to time to one of the trustees without the sanction of the other. Six years after the last of such payments the other trustee, who was tenant for life under the will, and her children, who were entitled to the fund subject to her life interest, sued the solicitors for restitution of the fund. It was held that the Statute of Limitations was no defence. I am not sure that the ground of this decision was not that the money retained the character of real estate, in which case the statutory period would be twenty years, which had not elapsed. In Re Bell (14), the solicitor, who acted for a mortgagee selling the mortgaged estate under a power of sale, retained the balance of the purchase money, and it was held that he became an express trustee of it, and that his executors could not rely on the Statute of Limitations.

Burdick v. Garrick (1); Gray v. Bateman (13); Banner v. Berridge (12); Re Cross, Harston v. Tenison (17), recognise that express trusts of personal property may be created either verbally or by conduct only, and that s. 25 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, to quote the language of BAGGALLAY, L.J., in the last-mentioned case (20 Ch.D. at p. 121),

"is but a statutory declaration of a law which had always been recognised and administered in courts of equity."

In the first of these cases it was held that agents entrusted with funds under a power of attorney which authorised them to manage the real and personal property of their principal, to receive rents, to sell, to purchase lands to be conveyed to

A or in trust for their principal, and to invest the residue in certain securities in the name of the principal or of some other person in trust for him, were in a fiduciary position, which disabled them from relying on the Statute of Limitations. LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., said (5 Ch. App. at p. 240):

B "How a person who is entrusted with funds under such circumstances differs from one in an ordinary fiduciary position I am unable to see. That being so, the Statute of Limitations appears to me to have no application to the case."

GIFFARD, L.J., concurred, relying on the very special power of attorney as an answer to the defence of the Statute of Limitations. He said (ibid. at p. 243):

C "Under these circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying that there was, in the plainest possible terms, a direct trust created . . . and I do not hesitate to say that, where the duty of persons is to receive property and hold it for another, and to keep it until it is called for, they cannot discharge themselves from that trust by appealing to the lapse of time. They can only discharge themselves by handing over the property to somebody entitled to it."

D This case was followed by WICKENS, V.-C., in Gray v. Bateman (13), where an agent who had acted for a person since deceased during his lifetime with full and unrestricted powers of managing his property, was held to be a trustee who could not avail himself of the Statute of Limitations.

E Barnes v. Addy (2) is an instructive and important authority. The surviving trustee of a fund, in exercise of a power of appointing new trustees, appointed a trustee of one moiety of the fund, remaining himself sole trustee of the other moiety. His solicitor advised against the appointment, but prepared the deed of appointment, and also a deed of indemnity from the new trustee. There was no suspicion of any intention on the part of the new trustee to misappropriate the fund, but he afterwards did so, and the cestuis que trust of the moiety so lost filed a bill against the original trustee and his solicitor, seeking to make them both liable as having concurred in a breach of trust. LORD SELBORNE, L.C., held that the solicitor was not in the position of a trustee, saying this (9 Ch. App. at pp. 251, 252):

G "In this case we have to deal with certain persons who are trustees, and with certain other persons who are not trustees. That is a distinction to be borne in mind throughout the case. Those who create a trust clothe the trustee with a legal power and control over the trust property, imposing on him a corresponding responsibility. That responsibility may no doubt be extended in equity to those who are not properly trustees, if they are found either making themselves trustees de son tort, or actually participating in any fraudulent conduct of the trustee to the injury of the cestui que trust. But, on the other hand, strangers are not to be made constructive trustees merely because they act as the agents of trustees in transactions within their legal powers—transactions perhaps of which a court of equity may disapprove—unless those agents receive or become chargeable with some part of the trust property, or unless they assist with knowledge in a dishonest or fraudulent design on the part of the trustees."

H These words seem to me to define, as accurately as is perhaps possible, the difference between an express and constructive trustee. A stranger to the trust, who receives the trust money with notice of the trust, or knowingly assists the actual trustee in a fraudulent and dishonest disposition of the trust property, is a constructive trustee. The trust may be clear, may be declared in a written instrument, and may be in that sense express, but the stranger is not expressly appointed a trustee. He becomes bound by the trust by the construction which the law puts upon his dealings with the trust property. The result seems to be that there are certain cases of what are, strictly speaking, constructive trusts, in which the Statute of Limitations cannot be set up as a defence. Among these are the case where a stranger to the trust has assumed to act and has acted as a trustee, and the case where a stranger has concurred with the trustee in committing a breach of trust, and has taken possession of the trust property, knowing that it was trust property, and has not duly discharged himself of it by handing it over to the proper trustees or to the persons absolutely entitled to it. A

I think that the present case comes within one or both those categories. I think that Ashwell did assume to act and acted as a trustee of the funds which he received, and that he has not duly discharged himself from the plaintiff's share of those funds, and must, therefore, be treated as an express trustee. The judgment must be reversed, and the appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below. B
If the executrix admits assets, there will be judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of £128, with interest at 4 per cent. since the last payment of interest. If assets are not admitted, there must be the usual judgment for an account, which should be transmitted to a chancery judge to work out. C

NEW ZEALAND GOLD EXTRACTION CO. (NEWBERRY-VAUTIN PROCESS), LTD. v. PEACOCK AND OTHERS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, A. L. Smith and Davey, L.JJ.), December 4, 1893]

[Reported [1894] 1 Q.B. 622; 63 L.J.Q.B. 227; 70 L.T. 110; 9 R. 669]

Company—Sale of undertaking—Transfer of amounts due for unpaid calls—Uncalled capital called up before sale completed.

The memorandum of association of a company empowered it "to sell the undertaking of the company . . . for shares . . . of any other company" having similar objects. In 1892 the directors entered into a contract with another company by which the company agreed to sell and transfer to the other company its assets, including all amounts due for unpaid calls, in exchange for shares in the other company. The agreement having been approved by the shareholders of both companies, the directors of the first company called up an unpaid 10s. per share. G

Held: "undertaking" in the memorandum might not include uncalled capital and the company might have no power to sell uncalled capital as part of their undertaking, but the calling up of uncalled capital before the sale was completed was not ultra vires the company, and the call was valid. H

Company—Shares—Unpaid call—Death of shareholder—Liability of estate.

By an article of association of a company a notice might be served by the company on any member at his registered address. A member of the company died. Notice of call on his shares was sent to his registered address, but was returned marked "gone away." When the liquidator of the company became aware of the member's death he applied for payment of the call to the member's executors who up to that time had not known that their testator had held any shares in the company. I

A Held: until notice of the member's death reached the company the dead man or his estate remained a member of the company, and, therefore, the member's estate was liable for the call.

Appeal by the defendants in an action by the liquidator of the New Zealand Gold Extraction Co. (Newbery-Vautin Process), Ltd. (which was in course of voluntary winding-up), in the name of the company, against the executors of John Thomas Peacock, a deceased shareholder, to recover £190, being the amount of a call of 10s per share on 380 shares of the plaintiff company which had belonged to the testator and had passed to the defendants as executors of his will. The defendants resisted the claim on the ground that the call was made for purposes which were ultra vires of the plaintiff company, and was, therefore, invalid; and further, that they had not been served with notice of the call in accordance with the articles of association of the plaintiff company.

Clauses 7, 11, and 12 of the memorandum of association of the plaintiff company empowered it:

G "7. To amalgamate, unite, or co-operate either generally or to or for any limited extent or period determinable, continuous, or otherwise with any corporations, companies, or persons already or hereafter to be established for or engaged in objects which are or shall be within the scope of the objects of this company, and to purchase or acquire the business or any interest in the business carried on by any such corporation, company, or persons, and being a business which this company is authorised to carry on, and for any such purpose to make and enter into any contracts, agreements, or arrangements, and to undertake any liabilities. 11. To sell the undertaking of the company or any part thereof for shares, debentures, or securities of any other company having objects altogether or in part similar to those of this company, or for any other consideration which the company may think fit. 12. To do all such things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects or any of them."

I By the articles of association of the plaintiff company the directors had power to make calls of which fourteen days' notice was to be given, specifying the time and place of payment and to whom such calls should be paid. Article 133 was as follows:

"A notice may be served by the company upon any member whose registered place of address is in the United Kingdom, either personally or by sending it through the post in a prepaid letter addressed to such member at his registered place of address."

The articles provided for forfeiture of shares for non-payment of calls, and for transfers by representatives of deceased members either to themselves or to other persons; but there was no provision that notices to the representatives of a member who had died should be valid if left at his registered address or sent by post addressed to him. A

In October, 1887, a company, called the Newbery-Vautin (Patents) Gold Extraction Co., Ltd., had been registered with the object, as stated by its memorandum of association, of purchasing the rights, property, assets, and effects of the Newbery-Vautin Gold Extraction Syndicate, Ltd., and the Newbery-Vautin Gold Extraction Co., Ltd., or of either of them. In January, 1892, the directors of the plaintiff company resolved to recommend to the shareholders the amalgamation of their company with the Newbery-Vautin (Patents) Gold Extraction Co., Ltd., and entered into an agreement on Jan. 7, 1892, with the latter company to convene a meeting to approve the agreement and to call up an uncalled 10s. per share upon the 20,000 shares of the plaintiff company by instalments, such call to be made before the time for the confirmation of special resolutions passed by the Newbery-Vautin company sanctioning the scheme. In the event of the agreement being duly approved by the shareholders of the two companies and the special resolutions being duly passed, the plaintiff company agreed to sell and transfer, and the Newbery-Vautin company agreed to purchase and take over, all and singular the patents, goods, chattels, moneys, credits, debts, and things in action, including all amounts due and to become due for calls on the shares of the plaintiff company, and the undertaking, business, and goodwill thereof, and other the assets of the plaintiff company, with the full benefit of all contracts and agreements and all securities held by the plaintiff company or to which the plaintiff company was entitled, and all other the property of the plaintiff company whatsoever and where-soever upon the terms thereafter expressed. The Newbery-Vautin company agreed to allot and issue to the plaintiff company, or the liquidators thereof or their respective nominees, 47,500 shares in the capital of the Newbery-Vautin company as fully paid up to the amount of £47,500—that was to say, one fully paid-up share of £1 for every complete number of two shares held by any member in the plaintiff company, and one fully paid-up share of 10s. for every single share in a holding or odd share beyond a multiple of two. It was provided that the Newbery-Vautin company should not be bound to issue or allot such shares in respect of any shares in the plaintiff company until the said calls for 10s. and any other calls that might be in arrear or payable thereon should have been paid, except to the holder of such unpaid shares in the plaintiff company at his request, and on an assignment to the Newbery-Vautin company of the amount of such calls. The agreement was approved by the shareholders of both companies, and in order to carry the scheme into effect a resolution of the directors of the plaintiff company was duly passed on Feb. 1, 1892, for a call of 10s. per share payable by four instalments of 2s. 6d. each, the last payment being due on Sept. 19, 1892. A resolution was also passed and confirmed on April 6 and 28, 1892, for the voluntary liquidation of the plaintiff company. B

Notice of the call was given through the post by letter addressed to John Thomas Peacock at his registered address. Peacock, however, had died on Feb. 15, 1889, and his will, by which the defendants were appointed his executors, had been duly proved by them some time prior to the making of the call. The letter enclosing the notice of the call was returned through the post to the company with the words "gone away" marked on the outside. The plaintiff company did not become aware of Peacock's death until September, 1892, and thereupon the liquidator, in a letter dated Sept. 3, 1892, applied to Peacock's executors for payment of the call, informing them that the notice sent to Peacock's registered address had been returned through the post. The executors had not received the notice sent to Peacock's registered address, and they did not know, until the liquidator made this application, that Peacock held any shares in the plaintiff company. On Dec. 29, 1892, the defendants' solicitors wrote that their counsel I

A had advised the defendants that they should not pay the call, which he was of opinion was ultra vires. Consequently, this action was brought on Jan. 5, 1893. It came on for trial before KENNEDY, J., sitting without a jury, in August, 1893, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff company. The defendants appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Eustace Smith for the defendants.

B Channell, Q.C., and C. T. Mitchell, for the plaintiff company, were not called on to argue.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not see any difficulty in deciding the first point—that the call was bad because it was made for purposes which were ultra vires of the company.

C This is an action brought by the liquidator of a company now in course of voluntary winding-up to enforce a call not made by him, but made by the directors before the commencement of the winding-up. The question whether that call is invalid as being made for purposes which are ultra vires depends upon what were the objects for which the company was formed. The provisions of the memorandum are in extremely wide terms, and, among others, are cl. 7, 11, and 12. [His LORDSHIP read those clauses, and continued:] While their shares were still not fully paid up the company agreed to sell their undertaking to the Newbery-Vautin, Patents company. It is said that the word “undertaking” in cl. 11 of the memorandum does not include uncalled capital. Perhaps it does not, but, although there may be no power to sell uncalled capital as part of the undertaking, nevertheless, one of the terms of the sale of the undertaking can be that the uncalled capital should be called up before the sale is completed. There is nothing ultra vires in that. There is no reason why the purchasers should not make that a condition of the sale. I see no difficulty in that point at all.

E The next point is a purely technical one. This shareholder, Mr. Peacock, obtained, and was registered in respect of, 380 shares, and he died on Feb. 15, 1889. At the time of his death his name and address were still on the register, and that address was the place to which notices were to be sent. The company were not informed of Mr. Peacock's death; if they had been, it would have been their duty to rectify the register. On the other hand, Mr. Peacock's executors had no information that he had been the holder of these shares, and did not ascertain the fact for some time after the agreement by the company for the sale of their business. After his death, and before the fact of his being a shareholder came to the knowledge of his executors, the call was made, and it is said that, he being dead, the directors could not make a call on him; that, his executors not having been made members of the company in his place, there was no member in respect of his shares to whom notice could be given in accordance with the articles; and that, consequently, the call cannot be enforced against his estate. Notice of the call was sent addressed to him at his registered place of address, but it came back to the company marked “Gone away.”

H The question is whether in these circumstances his executors are liable to pay the call out of his assets. Let us go by steps. He became a member, but his executors did not become members, and were not bound to do so against their will. The articles are so drawn that they do not provide for dead men, nor for notice to dead men, nor for notice to anybody in the place of dead men. It is said that it is part of the bargain between the shareholders and the company that, if a member dies, and the company have no notice of his death, his estate cannot be called upon to pay calls. On the construction of the articles I think it is obvious that no such bargain was intended. We must put a reasonable construction on the articles, and I have no doubt that the key to the difficulty is to be found in the suggestion made by MR. BUCKLEY in his book on the COMPANIES ACTS (6th Edn.), at p. 461, and that until notice of his death reaches the company the dead man, or his estate, continues to be a member. I have no doubt that that is the true construction of the articles. In order not to make these articles absurd, we must hold that a deceased member remains a member until notice is given.

DAVEY, L.J.—I agree with the judgment and opinion which have just been expressed, and I agree with the reasons given for his decision by KENNEDY, J. On the first point I should have been almost prepared to admit that the scheme might have been an amalgamation, and I only hesitate because I do not know the exact meaning of the word “amalgamation,” and whether it must be a joining of two companies so as to form a third entity. If so, the scheme is not within cl. 7, but I think it is clearly within the power of sale. The memorandum ought to be read in the widest possible way, and not so as to make this scheme ultra vires if it is otherwise unobjectionable. I quite agree that, if this is not an amalgamation, it is a sale within cl. 11. The question is whether the call is included in the sale. It has been held that the words “undertaking” does not include uncalled capital [in King v. Marshall (1)], and it would be ultra vires to sell the right of making calls to another company. But there is nothing to prevent the directors exercising their power of making calls and then selling the assets thus produced. Counsel for the defendants has quoted no authority against that proposition, and I do not see anything to make such a proceeding ultra vires.

The second question is whether art. 133 can be read so as to include a deceased member, so that the company could serve him with notice in the way there provided. I do not think that, if they had notice of the death of the member, they could rely on notice upon him at his registered place of address, and nothing that we say in this case touches that question. It is the duty of the representatives of a deceased member to give notice of his death to the company at the earliest possible opportunity; and if they want to go on treating him as still on the books, it is the duty of the executors to give notice to the company, and send notice to them of their desire to become members in his place. It is to be observed that Table A contains no such article as is said to be necessary, and it is surprising to me to hear that such a clause is requisite in order to make the estate of a deceased member liable. It would surprise most people to hear that without such an article you cannot make a call upon and enforce it against the estate of a dead member. I am prepared to adopt Mr. BUCKLEY's suggestion, and to hold that a deceased member, or his estate, remains a member so long as his name continues on the register without notice to the company of his death.

Amy Page for life, and after her decease to all the children of Amy Page living at her death, as tenants in common. Ann Palmer died on April 16, 1855, and her will was duly proven by the executors named therein. At the date of her death the testatrix was entitled to the fee simple of the land referred to in her will as the "Little Piece," with the exception of the small part which had been taken by the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Rail. Co. Amy Page and her three children were living at the death of the testatrix. In 1856 Amy Page, together with her husband Joseph Page and her children, mortgaged the "Little Piece" to secure a sum of £2,000, and in 1857 they executed a further charge to secure the sum of £200.

On July 14, 1860, this mortgage and further charge were transferred to J. Hazlehurst, A. P. Shelley, and T. F. Hazlehurst. A
